A statistical analysis of interview data from 1,024 Tex battered wives shelters. As predicted, the wives' economic dependence almost always insured that they would return to their husbands. Another finding was that Rs who considered the shelters useful had a higher probability of returning to their husbands. A review of the literature is included. 3 Tables. 1 References. Modified AA

Factor Similarity of the Conflict Tactics Scales across Samples, Spouses, and Sites: Issues and Implications, Journal of Family Violence, 1987, 2, 1, Mar, 37-54

An analysis of the construct validity of M. A. Straus's Conflict Tactics Scale (CTS) ("Measuring Intrafamily Conflict & Violence: The Conflict Tactics (CT) Scales," Journal of Marriage & the Family, 1969, 41, 1, 75-88) for operationalizing the concept of marital (or interpartner) aggression. A revised version of the CTS (see SA 31 1/83M8705) was administered to 2 samples: (1) 187 couples who had sought treatment for marital discord at the State U of NY-Stony Brook's clinic, & (2) 398 couples from Onondaga & Suffolk counties, NY, who voluntarily participated in a longitudinal study of beginning marriages. Factor analyses reveal substantial similarity in the nature of the physical & psychological aggression factors across all variables in both samples. Suggestions for improving the reliability & validity of the CTS are offered along with some directions for future research. 4 Tables, 40 References. K Hyatt

Coslin, Frank & Schwarz, Norbert (U Illinois, Urbana 61801). Beliefs about Rape and Women's Social Roles: A Four-Nation Study, Journal of Interpersonal Violence, 1987, 2, 1, Mar, 47-56

The hypothesis that beliefs in rape myths are positively correlated with beliefs that restrict women's social roles & rights was tested in 4 countries between 1981-1983: US, England, Israel, & West Germany. Two report scales were used, one measuring the acceptance of rape myths & the other measuring restrictive beliefs about women's social roles. In addition to U graduates in the 4 countries, Ss included secondary school teachers from the US & England, & women & men from a variety of other occupations in the US. Acceptance of rape myths was significantly related with restrictive beliefs about women's social roles & rights in about 1 of the 19 groups tested. Social & educational implications of the confirmed hypothesis are discussed. 1 Table, 12 References. Modified A Recent investigations have explained regional differentials in homicide in reference to a reformulated subculture-of-violence thesis, which posits a southern subculture of violence. These studies heavily emphasize the role of firearms in violent subcultures. A model is developed that specifies the relationship between regions & subcultures of violence, while determining the relationship of both to gun ownership. Analysis of patterns of gun ownership among 1,653 male Rs to the 1976, 1980, & 1984 General Social Surveys of the National Opinion Research Center shows that violent values indicative of subculture-of-violence membership are related to region when structural factors are taken into account. Moreover, gun ownership is unrelated to the violent values indicative of subcultures of violence. Instead, both region & gun ownership are related to offensive attitudes that are not indicative of a subculture of violence. These results suggest that although interpersonal violence, such as homicide may be a function of subcultures of violence, these subcultures operate independently of region & may be associated with, but are in no way dependent on, firearms. 4 Tables, 2 Appendixes, 31 References. 1 A comparison of the rates of violence toward children found in the 1975 & 1985 National Family Violence Surveys. Both studies used nationally representative samples (1,146 families in 1975 & 1,428 in 1985), & both found a high incidence of severe violence against children. However, 1985 rates, although high, were substantially lower than those of 1975; the rate of severe violence was 47% lower in 1985. Possible reasons for the lower rates in 1985 are examined & evaluated, including, (1) increased reluctance to report; (2) differences in the method of study; (3) reductions due to 10 years of prevention & treatment efforts, & (4) reductions due to changes in US society & family patterns that might have produced lower rates of violence toward children even without ameliorative programs. 1 Table, 19 References. 1 Data from the National Center for Health Statistics are used to compute rates of violent death—from suicide, homicide, automobile accidents, & other accidents—among whites aged 15-24 for the 48 contiguous US states for 1939-1941, 1949-1951, 1959-1961, 1969-1971, & 1977-1979. Analysis reveals that the Ru western states invariably had the highest death rates from all causes for all periods, while the Ur northeastern states had the lowest. Moreover, the overall white M violent death rate in the 6 most dangerous Ru western counties was 13% higher than the comparable black rate in 6 eastern inner cities. It is also found that Emile Durkheim's explanation of suicide as springing from lack of integration into society holds across the nation for all forms of violent death, as measured by such indices of integration as religious participation & divorce & unemployment rates. Thus, in policy terms, the violent regional culture of the Ru West, along with national & worldwide changes in the family, lifestyles, & values, combine to place enormous stress on the young, & to create vast obstacles to their physical & psychological well-being, nearly all are beyond the direct or immediate impact of public intervention. 2 Maps. Reply, 691-694.

† Ken R. Smith & Cathleen D. Zick (see SA 35 3/87R6538) conclude that Ms & Fs entering widowhood have similar chances of experiencing poverty, other things especially age & years of employment experience being equal. A number of problems are identified with their analysis & interpretation of their findings: exclusion of couples who were poor in the year prior to widowhood, overlooking the complexity of age/period/cohort phenomena, use of arbitrary categorizations of variables, & failure to provide distributions or correlations for their variables by sex. Finally, sex is significantly correlated to other variables that do affect the probability of poverty in widowhood. In Assessing the Economic Status of Widows and Widowers: A Reply to Morgan, Smith & Zick (Survey Research Center, U of Utah, Salt Lake City) agree that the findings under discussion are surprising enough to merit further research, but question Morgan's other points. Morgan assumes that sex is the key mediating factor in predicting poverty among the widowed, however, the evidence suggests that several other factors are more significant & that sex has no effect apart from them. 1 Table, 2 Figures, 9 References. † Examined are the extent & some major causes of the continuing high rate of poverty among US blacks, along with changes over the last two decades in the composition of the poor black population. Analysis of 1959-1981 US Census data reveals a positive relationship between black economic problems & alterations in family structure that contribute to increased poverty; this relationship is particularly evident in the high poverty rates of households headed by single black Fs with dependent children. It is predicted that black poverty will remain high as long as black Ms continue to have earning & employment problems that affect family structures. 4 Tables, 33 References. K. Hyatt

Gurr ("Historical Trends in Violent Crime: A Critical Review of the Evidence," Crime & Justice: An Annual Review of Research, 1981, 3, 295-353) offers empirical data from which historical trends in homicide rates can be assessed. In general, the evidence suggests that homicide rates declined by a factor of two from the thirteenth to the sixteenth & seventeenth centuries, & by a factor of two from five to ten between the sixteenth & seventeenth centuries & the present. Over the same period, in-family homicide remained constant in rate & thus became an increasing share of all homicide. Litigation between families has also declined steadily. Two possible explanations are tenable that the cause was a gradual cultural shift in attitudes toward violence, or that it was a change from feudal to bourgeois values. More extensive statistical data are needed to provide a fuller understanding of this change. 1 Graph. W. H. Stoddard

It is argued that, contrary to popular belief, media reports, & government pronouncements, the US government actively supports international terrorism. Misperceptions regarding this activity are fostered by powerful leaders who control the Western media & successfully define terrorism in terms that exclude their own terrorist acts & those of their friends & clients. Various semantic devices employed in this subterfuge are identified, & myths circulated about international terrorists are exposed. It is shown how the US, in its position as a hegemonic power, has itself used or sponsored the use of various forms of terrorism, though labeling such acts "counterterrorist," including: (1) protection & rehabilitation of fascists; (2) outright or proxy invasions to protect terrorist clients; (3) subversive activities, including assassinations & sabotage, & (4) supporting repressive regimes via financial assistance, arms supply, & military training to Third World countries. Rather, it has been deliberately used to increase US control over such countries & their governments' use of nondemocratic means of social control. It is demonstrated that the Reagan administration's Iran/Contra activities are a continuation of US imperialist policies that are in frank violation of domestic & international law, such practices serve to further perceived US interests & destroy the enemies of such interests through the establishment of "overseas internal security programs" that institutionalize state terrorism. 53 References. † It is argued that state terrorism is an integral part of class struggle that is purposefully directed toward the creation of a political economic structure (ie, accumulation) & a specific set of interstate relations (ie, subordination to US hegemony). Its main objectives are to (1) defeat attempts by the Wc & popular social movements to change the distribution of wealth, & (2) destroy all democratic political & social institutions. * Using data from medical journals, published reports of court cases & various other medical publications & secondary sources, it is argued that a number of types of drugs prescribed exclusively or primarily for women were inadequately tested before marketing & were promoted with claims for effectiveness & safety that far outstripped reality; these drugs were extensively overprescribed, which resulted in suffering & death for thousands of women. Three primary explanatory factors are identified: the profit orientation of drug companies; the drug industry's position as the MD's primary source of drug information; & the typical MD-women patient relationship. The drug promotions that are analyzed are the minor tranquilizers, diethylstilbestrol (DES), the pill, estrogen replacement therapy, & Depo-Provera. 45 References. AA

* The belief that physical abuse of wives is strongly determined by drunkenness & SES is examined, using interview data from a nationally representative sample of 5,159 US families. The findings show that excessive drinking is associated with higher wife abuse rates; however, alcohol use is not an immediate antecedent of violence in the majority of families. The combination of blue collar status, drinking, & approval of violence is significantly associated with the highest rate of wife abuse. Of the three factors, cultural approval of violence by men against women has the strongest association with wife abuse. Although the results provide support for the "drunken bum" theory of wife beating, they also de-mythologize the stereotype because alcohol is shown to be far from a necessary or sufficient cause of wife abuse. 2 Tables, 7 Figures, 91 References. The rioting crowd's attitudes & expectations are detailed along with the government's reaction to the violence. * The relationships among unemployment, crime, & family disruption in the black underclass are examined, focusing on whether the effect of black adult M joblessness on black crime is mediated largely through effects on family disruption. Analysis of race-specific rates of robbery, homicide by juveniles & adults in 171 US cities in 1980 shows that scarcity of employed black Ms increases the prevalence of families headed by Fs in black communities. In turn, black family disruption substantially increases the rates of black murder & robbery, especially by juveniles. These effects are independent of income, region, race & age composition, density, city size, & welfare benefits, & are similar to the effects of white family disruption on white violence. It is concluded that there is nothing inherent in black culture that is conducive to crime. Rather, persistently high rates of black crime appear to stem from structural linkages among unemployment, economic deprivation, & family disruption in Ur black communities. 6 Tables, 1 Figure, 86 References. * Questionnaire survey data (N = 505 Coll students) are used to examine violence in white, heterosexual, dating relationships, with particular attention to gender differences. The analysis focuses on individual & relationship-specific characteristics that influence the propensity for men to use & receive violence. The results strongly suggest that seriousness of the relationship & the personality dimensions of instrumentality & expressiveness explain dating violence for men, while a situational jealousy explains dating violence for women. Additionally, though men & women do not significantly differ in the rate at which they use violence, women are more likely than men to receive violence. These findings are understood in terms of the aspect of control that underlies violent relationships. 3 Tables, 25 References. HA

A report on results of an exploratory interview study of 60 white, heterosexual, physically & mentally healthy Fs aged 40-55, focusing on the effects of the interaction of perceptions of the aging process & external factors, particularly menopause, on Fs' emotional state. Overall, Rs were in a state of discomfort directly attributable to menopause. Major themes that emerged among all groups were: fear of physical deterioration, lack of knowledge about reversibility of physical changes & sensation, a belief they lacked sufficient information about menopause, & guilt about inability to control their behavior enough to avoid bodily signs of aging other than menopause (eg, aches & pains, less energy). Security in marriage & work, for those for whom paid work was important, were so important that Rs limited their opportunities for personal growth or job satisfaction to maintain security. The results support the concept that menopause is a normal event, & is not in itself disruptive, however, many Fs fear their bodies are going out of control & that they are responsible. When they perceive the security of their lives to be fragile, either in marriage or work, the threat of a weakening body increases feelings of stress. Suggestions are made for provision of services for middle-aged Fs by social workers & others in the helping professions. 1 Table. Modified AA

Seven states that hold expert testimony unconditionally admissible are identified & discussed. States that have approved conditional admissibility & the measure of that admissibility are examined. The remaining states that have held such testimony inadmissible & the reasons for arriving at their conclusions are detailed. Based on this overview, a trend firmly in favor of some degree of admissibility of expert testimony on the battered woman syndrome is identified. F Rasmussen

¶ Interview data from 5 Cuban women are utilized to examine the impact of 27 years of Cuba's socialist government & society on women, focusing on historical, economic, & political factors. Although the Cuban socialist process has set up possibilities for gender equality, it can only be realized through the continuous application of government policies from above & the expansion of consciousness from below. The interaction between government-level policies & grass-roots consciousness-raising occurs in the economic, political, & social spheres, & is actualized in terms of women's work, relationships & power. 24 References. Collins, Barbara G. (Dept Sociology East Stroudsburg State Coll, PA 18301), Defining Feminist Social Work, in Social Work, 1986, 31, 3, May-June, 214-219

¶ The values & perspectives of feminism & social work share many elements, but little effort has been made so far to incorporate feminist insights into social work practice. An overview is offered of feminist theory—ultimately a critique of the masculine principle on which society is founded & feminist method whose basic assumption is that the personal is political. It is suggested that feminist theory & method have much in common with social work's support for the inherent dignity of each unique individual. Recently, social work has come under challenge from neoconservatism. The feminist perspective can help defend against this challenge, define social work's identity, & encourage a feminist social work. Modified HA a metropolitan area are analyzed to assess their social support. Three subgroups are identified: widowed, divorced/separated, & never married (N = 21, 7, & 24, respectively). Although potentially at risk with regard to attaining social supports, most of the Rs had developed substitute supports for the close kin they lacked. Most of the Rs were younger elderly, aged 65-74, & considered themselves in good health. 4 Tables. Modified HA

(Eds.), Time, Goods, and Well-Being, Ann Arbor, Mich: Survey Research Center 1983) & Israel (Gronau, R., "The Allocation of Time of Israeli Women," Journal of Political Economy, 1976, 84, 4, 201-220). In general men & women spend about the same number of hours working (in the market & at home), but employed women work more hours than men do. Two factors strongly influence women's participation in the market: level of education & presence of children. Means of estimating the value of work in the nonmarket sector are discussed & found to be wanting. Information on production in the home sector is still sketchy. 1 Table, 19 References. Modified HA

* It is argued that certain exclusionary practices, gender biases, & research methods operating in Western social science serve to preclude a comprehensive study of women's experience. Feminist research methodology & analysis are posited as a way of overcoming these omissions. Personal experiences researching women's experiences within colonial social transformations are described, with focus on a case study of British missionaries in India. It is argued that existing sociological models of colonialism are rooted in the ethnocentrism of Western social science, & thus neglect the fact that colonialism is an interactive social process. 26 References. * The f of contact that mature women have with their children, parents, siblings, & in-laws is examined based on data from the National Longitudinal Study of Mature Women, a longitudinal survey of approximately 5,000 Fs aged 30-44 in 1967 when the panel began. In 1981, the 3,677 Rs remaining (aged 44-59) were asked how often they had face-to-face or telephone contact with the different types of kin. A 7-point scale ranging from daily to never was used to measure f of contact. Rs were most frequently in contact with their children, followed by parents, in-laws, & siblings. More than 95% of each subgroup who had kin were in contact with at least one kin member monthly. It is concluded that these findings may reduce the concern about a lack of family support among the next generation of elderly. 4 Tables, 5 References. Modified AA

When Fs are deprived both of traditional responsibility for tending herds & of modern opportunities afforded by schooling, the noneconomic nature of norms is revealed. The rationale of confining the woman to the household is to enable her to be fully devoted to reproduction. Since the size of the agnatic group determines its hierarchical location on the social ladder, intensive reproduction is necessary for upward mobility. 3 Tables, 44 References. Modified HA

The F labor market, the sexual double standard, women's traditional roles in the family economy, & women's emerging roles in a consumer society shaped women's motives for migration, the constraints they faced as migrants, & the responses they forged in the Ur environment. * A cross-cultural comparison of M dominance structures based on previous research enables the unraveling of some intellectual disagreements about feminist strategies in relation to motherhood. Latin American women's emphasis on motherhood as a political strategy is contrasted with the antimotherhood position of many US feminists to show how both positions reflect different sociocultural conditions & patterns of M domination. The ideal of motherhood in the US has isolated women & weakened their position in the family & society. In Mexico, motherhood is the basis of successful F political action. First & Third World women enhance their subordination when each group argues that it is better off than the other, because they merely express prevailing dominant M ideologies in their respective societies. A different approach to the problem of universal F subordination is one in which anthropology can make an important contribution. 29 References. HA

† Ideas about menstruation in seventeenth century GB were largely shaped by MDs' notions of F's inherent inferiority & were in turn used to justify F's inferior position in society. Data from medical records, diaries, & casebooks of MDs & astrologers whom women consulted indicate that menstruation was most commonly considered a purgation or plethora, & described in language that was at best neutral, but usually negative. Analysis of women's medical commonplace books reveals that they often did not share their MDs' attitudes toward menstruation, but generally accepted it as a normal part of their lives; their attitudes toward it were largely shaped by those they held toward childbearing. The most important influence on attitudes about menstruation was the Bible, which was the source of various rituals & taboos concerning menstruating women. This influence gradually waned as scientific & medical knowledge increased. However, MDs' long-held attitudes continued to shape their beliefs about women in general & women's social roles & functions in particular. K. Hyatt

† Factors that affect Honduran women's market sector participation & its impact on the family's level of living are examined from data collected in household interviews (N = 131) in Moroceli, Honduras, in 1981. The analysis, which includes correlations & regression methods, reveals that the Honduran woman in the informal sector is likely to have no formal education & to be part of a F-headed household, relatively old, single, part of a free conjugal union arrangement, part of an extended family, & caring for a relatively greater number of young children. The participant in the formal sector is likely to be younger, also a member of an extended family, & married; she will have fewer young children but more of them will be toddlers. The woman's participation in either sector raises the level of living for the household. 3 Tables, 38 References. HA

† The role of women in riots in Holland prior to 1800 is examined, using data culled from judicial archives. Women were participating in & leading riots about food prices & taxation, but also involving religious & political issues. In 26 riots & 50 demonstrations analyzed, all participants were F. The usual explanations for such participation are: Fs controlled the household finances & were thus the first to protest against rising food prices; they were ascribed a more disorderly character & acted accordingly to it, & they were regarded as not legally responsible & could participate with less risk than Ms. It is argued that these explanations are insufficient, rather, a fourth motive is proposed that emphasizes the central place of women in neighborhoods, & in kinship & friendship networks. These networks were the social basis of revolt in preindustrial Europe; during protest activities, women organized the community to defend itself against threats from outside. However, their role diminished after 1800, mainly because the social basis for protest changed. M organizations, like labor unions & political parties, took over the place of informal networks as lines of communication. Modified AA

† In the Progressive era, women sought the vote through an alliance with progressive reformers, who wanted to undermine the power of political bosses. The suffragists were largely members of the social elite. Harriett Stanton Blatch was one of the first feminist leaders to recognize the concerns of Wc women & to identify them as including numerous industrial laborers. At the same time, her analysis of women & work contained contradictions that she did not resolve. She eventually founded the Equal League of Self-Supporting Women, in which, paradoxically, she was the only member not earning her living by her own work. She became a leader of the suffragette movement, many of whose members were of Wc origins, but the radicalism of the suffragettes cannot be equated with radicalism. * An important aspect of the religious world of a group of elderly, pious, Kurdish Jewish women in Jerusalem, Israel, is examined, based on fieldwork. While previous scholars have stressed the connection between menopause (with the resultant loss in fertility, but also menstrual pollution) & the increased religious involvement of old women, it is argued that the broadening of the religious lives that these women experience in old age is connected above all to widowhood. The women studied see old age (& more specifically widowhood) as a time for deepening & expanding their religious lives. Now that they are no longer busy with the demands of husbands & small children, they can devote increased time & energy to religious pursuits. Specifically, the focus of their religious world shifts from the domestic to the public sphere. The synagogue, senior citizen's day center, cemeteries, & holy tombs are the most important public, sacred spaces frequented. 15 References. Modified HA.

* A fundamental assumption of stratification theory is that the family is the unit of stratification, with no inequality between husband & wife. The argument here is that the condition for this spousal equality is the economic dependency of married women & that an examination of dependency is essential for understanding women's societal position. Changes in the extent to which married women were economically dependent on their husbands from 1940 to 1980 are examined using data from the Public Use Samples of the relevant decennial US censuses. The finding is that the situation in 1980 is greatly different from the situation in 1940, when the majority of married women were completely dependent on spouses for economic support. Today, completely dependent wives constitute a minority. Women of minority groups were less dependent than white women throughout this period. Married women become less dependent as they grow older, owing in part to the Social Security benefits that accrue to them, regardless of LF participation. A multivariate analysis pinpoints the source of most marital dependency as being the labor supply of married women. It also shows that married women must work longer hours than their husbands to contribute equally to family income. 8 Tables, 38 References. HA.

While some predict that the enhanced use of women police officers will diminish the quality of public services, others argue precisely the opposite point of view. It is suggested that such predictions have much more to do with the political & ideological perspectives of advocates & opponents of affirmative action than with empirical observation. Results of a 1981 national questionnaire survey completed by police chiefs in 254 US cities indicate that little if any effect on police agency performance can be attributed to differing employment levels of F police officers. ¶ The scientific orientation of Yugoslav sociologist Vera Stein Erlich (1897-1980) was profoundly affected by her study of anthropology at the U of Berkeley, Calif, in the 1950s & 1960s. Her primary interest in psychology, education, & the status of women shifted toward the anthropological analysis of changes in the patriarchal family & society. The most natural theoretical link between the two phases of her intellectual development was the culture & personality school dominating US anthropology at that time. An analysis of her Family in Transition (Princeton: Princeton U Press, 1966) & U društvu s čovjekom ([In the Company of Man], Zagreb: Liber, 1968) traces the theoretical influences of Alfred Kroeber, Ruth Benedict, Margaret Mead, & Roberta Redfield on her concepts of culture, cultural style, mentality, & patriarchal society. 5 References. ¶ Although the intellectual projects of women's history & family history have been diverse, there have been some fruitful interrelationships, as well as continuing disagreements, about conceptualization & method. A systematic examination was carried out of the content of articles published 1976-1985 in the Journal of Family History, in 3 self-defined feminist or women's studies journals, & in 4 general historical journals (ΣN = 233 articles). Definitions of the 2 fields derived from this exercise show that women's history, unlike family history, is movement history; it is closer to more central historical fields in the kinds of questions it asks & in method. Because of its role in placing women as a group into a context of family relationships, family history has an important contribution to make to women's history. To the extent that diversity among women, institutions, & informal politics become more central to women's history, it will come closer to family history. 2 Tables, 36 References. HA.

¶ An examination of three theoretical traditions of "primordial units of social reality" & how they have caused shifts in ideological responses to women & their status in society. The "individual" (before the mid-eighteenth century), "society" (after the mid-eighteenth century), & "world system" (since the mid-twentieth century) traditions are discussed in depth along with their dominant ideologies & theoretical justifications for the ways that women were treated. In the individual tradition, Fs were considered slaves, a view that changed little during the early society tradition, when structural-functionalists justified F subordination on biological grounds. The conflict theorists, primarily Marxist feminists, challenged this notion, locating F inequality within the cultural Doff. With the advent of the world system perspective, F inequality came to be recognized as a problem of society as a whole, & women's full participation in the new international economic order gradually gained global support. 115 References. ¶ A review of the literature shows that the social sciences have not adequately distinguished between the biological category of sex & the social organization of sexuality, ie, the distinction between sex & gender. An analysis of Yugoslav sociologist Vera Stein Erlich's (1897-1980) U društvu s čovjekom ([In the Company of Man], Zagreb: Liber, 1968) & other works uncovers a certain flexibility of categories relating essential but fragmentary elements of an anthropology of gender, expressing two main, though insufficiently elaborated, points: (1) every culture interprets & appreciates distinctions between men & women differently, & (2) Fs are commonly associated with social strata low on scales of hierarchical & cultural evaluation. Due to this surprising perceptiveness of concepts of gender & gender asymmetry, her writings are interesting to modern students of the anthropology of gender & to feminists. Modified HA

¶ An examination of the role of biological & social evolutionism in the making of feminist socialist theory within the US Socialist Party before WWI. Women's supposed evolutionary uniqueness was traditionally used by antifeminists to justify F subordination in US society, & even in the Socialist Party. Rosalind Rosenberg (Beyond Separate Spheres: Intellectual Roots of Modern Feminism, New Haven & London, 1982) suggests that earlier feminists such as Jane Addams rejected Darwinian arguments for woman's mental inferiority but continued to believe that her uniquely "moral" nature was an evolutionary product, later social scientists, many of them women, finally freed women from the very idea of uniqueness, but thereby undercut the traditional foundations of feminism. In a brief but creative outburst that ended in 1915, some Marxist women posed tentative challenges to F uniqueness, while others reformulated it in the language of modern science, using the ideological resources of traditional feminism & scientific socialism. They sought to negate the implications of inferiority & the tendency to sharply distinguish M from

F spheres of activity that went with uniqueness, while making the case based on her particular evolutionary history, that woman's conce could not be adequately addressed if subsumed under the vague pron of economic socialist evolutionism. Because of resistance to feminism among M socialists, & also as part of the general eclipse of theoretical work in the Socialist Party that accompanied the sharpening of factional divisions after 1908, it was economism that triumphed as this phase feminist & socialist history came to an end. ¶ An examination of nineteenth-century Lowell millgirl writings, published & unpublished, suggests that the narratives assisted the women developing a positive self image despite prevailing negative social attitudes toward industrial workers & working women. By articulating encouraging a positive collective identity, these narratives were found have supported the millgirls in their labor protests. It is shown that women's literary activities were central to the elaboration of identity, a certain conception of the factory girl that even forty years later was found in Lowell millgirl autobiographies. The narratives examined here were more than a source of historical facts, they were part the historical process in the formation of a collective identity. 3 Photographs. AA

¶ It is argued that feminist social theory fails to challenge sociology at the theoretical level. Instead, it has merely encouraged an empirical focus on women as a category. This has led to the deradicalization & ghettoization of feminist sociology. The failure of sociology to challenge the parameters of traditional social theory lies in its own theoretical abstractions, which impede both an analysis of societal development & an explanation of the subordinations experienced by women. These abstractions are critiqued, & new conceptualizations of production & reproduction are offered, in an attempt to escape the dualism of contemporary socialist-feminist theory. 38 References. AA

The social reproduction of gender in a Canadian U physical education program is investigated using data from participant observation, document analysis, & ethnographic interviews with 28 students & 14 faculty. The program curriculum distinguishes between biological/behavioral & sociocultural courses. Each type provides students with alternative views of gender. Students tend to view the biological/behavioral explanations of sex differences in performance capabilities as more practical & important than information on the social construction of gender issues offered in the sociocultural courses. It is unlikely that students will accept such alternative explanations of gender differences unless the societal processes that maintain M hegemony are also challenged & transformed. 24 References. S. Sharma & R. However, their conclusions were drawn from small samples. Analyses of test score data on 693 girls & 721 boys, collected during the Girls into Science & Technology project in GB, & comparable data from the national population, qualify their findings. Studying physics does seem to improve mathematics achievement, but studying technical drawing does not. No overall sex difference in mathematics achievement at age 16 is found, but girls also studying physics achieved more in math than boys studying both subjects. 4 Tables, 5 References. Modified HA

Lidz, Theodore & Lidz, Ruth W. (Dept Psychiatry Yale School of Medicine, New Haven CT 06519), Turning Women Things into Men: Masculinization in Papua New Guinea, UM The Psychoanalytic Review, 1986, 73, 4, winter, 117-135

Psychoanalysis has only recently begun to consider, in addition to the oedipal transition, the problems in development created by a boy's need to give up initial identification with the mother & establish M identity. Child development in many societies of Papua New Guinea takes place within a social structure that makes this problem especially acute. Fathers typically live apart from their wives & children, leaving the children under the mother's control. Many New Guinean societies practice elaborate rituals that often focus on ritual homosexuality & on simulated M menstruation, conceptualized in terms of supplying the body with M fluids & ridding it of F fluids. Women are often regarded as polluted & dangerous beings. An account of the initiation rituals of the Bimin-Kuskusmin & Telefol peoples, based on a number of published studies, reveals a different ritual pattern that does not include homosexual practices, but is designed to destroy identification with the mother & build a new M identity. However, after this, later initiation rituals reaffirm the interdependence of the sexes & teach ways of having contact with Fs safely. These rituals illuminate the problems of boys in other cultures, such as the US, as well as in the cultures where they are conducted. 24 References. W. H. Stoddard

W. Norton, 1983) (see listings in IRPS No. 41). These four books attempt to situate women in specific spatial & temporal settings in Ur history, achieving in the process a richer synthesis of Ur history & history of women. Blackwelder ably synthesizes statistical with biographical data to portray the interplay of sex with SC & caste, though she tends to disregard gender relations. Lebsock, in contrast, focuses on gender relations & the values they embodied. Hewitt presents data on women in the North during the nineteenth century that challenge views of women's roles as exclusively private. Finally, Arrom provides a cross-cultural perspective on these issues in her examination of Mexico City. All four books raise new issues for the Ur historian. W. H. Stoddard

Rakow, Lana F. (Dept Communication U Wisconsin Parkside, Kenosha 53141), Rethinking Gender Research in Communication, UM Journal of Communication, 1986, 36, 4, autumn, 11-26

¶ A review of gender research in communication reveals that major research traditions of the past two decades—sex differences research in sociolinguistics & speech communication & media images & effects research—have rested on unexamined assumptions about the nature of gender. Researchers have assumed gender is based on two pre-given biological categories of M & F that cause different communication behavior. Feminist theory, however, challenges these assumptions. It is suggested that gender is more usefully conceptualized as a culturally constructed organization of biology & social life into particular ways of doing, thinking, & experiencing the world. It is in communication that this gender system is accomplished. Gender has meaning, is organized & structured, & takes place as interaction & social practice, all of which are communication processes; i.e., communication creates genders who create communication. Communication research should no longer assume the very concept of gender & communication that it should set out to explain. 44 References. AA

¶ Gender differences in managerial styles are examined, based on interview data from 22 F & 18 M managers & their secretaries. Analysis indicates that Rs perceived that women were both task- & people-oriented, while men appeared to be image-engrossed & autonomy-invested. Rs reported a strong preference for their gender-appropriate model & misunderstanding, even exasperation, with those using the alternative approach. The existence of such different models, especially if unrecognized, would place women at a disadvantage, since their success as managers is usually assessed by men who are likely to have a strong preference for the M-typed approach. The findings also suggest possible modifications to existing measures of managerial styles, particularly a consideration of image-engrossed approaches. 2 Tables, 1 Appendix. Modified AA

† Two articles are presented on recent developments in the fields of women's history. In Early Modern Europe, Olwen Hufton (U of Reading, England) notes the problems of the women's history project in dealing with the early modern period & the need for a variety of approaches. Major concerns of historical studies have been demography, history of the family, women & work, literacy, attitudes toward women's roles, women's religion, witchcraft, the role of women in crime, & women in politics. In The Modern Period, Joan Wallach Scott (Brown U, Providence, RI) marks on the diversity & complexity of women's history, but points to the common focus of the field on making women agents of the narrative. Several approaches prevalent in North America are compared: the "history" approach ie, the rewriting of conventional history, especially social history & the development of theoretical interpretations for which gender is a fundamental explanatory category. * When confronting the French ethnological tradition concerning the definition of the ethnic & tribal group & the theoretical logic of recent French Marxist anthropology (1960-1975), a dangerous confusion is found between the empiricist notion of anthropological research & the basic concepts of historical materialism. The mono-ethnic fieldwork tradition, & the philosophical background of French sociology & anthropology are some of the causes of this situation. Themes of French anthropology are discussed, including the construction of the mode of production, the role of kinship, & the nature of precapitalism & social change. Marxism is to be considered as just one new anthropological theory & not a revolutionary break from past theoretical traditions. This theory is analyzed in relation to E. Terray's description of the Abron Kingdom (Ivory Coast), which mentions the possibility of ethnic communities as SCs ("Classes and Class Consciousness in the Abron Kingdom of Gyaman" in Bloch, M. (Ed), Marxist Analyses and Social Anthropology, London, Malaby Press, 1975). An assessment of this literature shows that Marxist anthropologists, like other anthropologists, focus on specific ethnic groups. Even if it is considered as a historical product, especially of colonial domination & policies, ethnic group is both a name & a form of social consciousness. Marxism cannot evolve independently from the methodological constraints of fieldwork & from the historical & intellectual context of Marxism, on the one hand, & of anthropology theory (as a theory of Third World societies), on the other. Classic works of French Marxist anthropology are critiqued, though recent changes that transform Marxist anthropology into a real historical (empirical) anthropology are acknowledged. It is argued that the framework dealing with modern ethnicity can be applied to the analysis of precolonial ethnicity. 36 References. AA

It is suggested that his own statements are the best guide to his empirical & dialectical methods. He considered himself a materialist who saw the world as matter-in-motion, but in a special sense: he understood motion as including qualitative change. The dialectical method through which he sought to present such change cannot be reduced to a straightforward empirical hypothesis, despite the abundant empirical content of his work. † Throughout history, ownership has been accorded a special significance, having been discussed by numerous scholars with conflicting outlooks due to their class-tainted interests. Every ruling class, with its ideology, has sought to show how its form of ownership is the only one possible, corresponding to the interests of society overall. Such justification of class monopoly over the means of production proceeds under a veil of humanity, righteousness, & scientific method, representing the known arsenal of developed class societies in their convulsive struggle to preserve their privileges when physical force no longer suffices. Such ideologies usually claim that private ownership is a natural, eternal category whose elimination would mean the elimination of personality, society, & freedom. The axiom of ownership equality is often rationalized by analogy to physical & mental inequalities. Modified HA

† A common interpretation of historical materialism, which sees it as providing philosophical support for a society that legitimizes its restrictions on free action through determinist explanations, is questioned, arguing that such a determinist interpretation is inaccurate & regressive. The progression of theories of free action is traced from economic determinism, exemplified by Karl Marx's early conceptions of the natural laws of capitalist production, through a humanist dualism, to a holistic perspective—that of political economy—that integrates the human factors in free action with external causal stimuli. A "framework" interpretation of historical materialism is advanced challenging the idea that external economic forces can act to determine human action in the absence of internal, autonomous factors, eg. values & motives, & proposing a multiple stimulus causation of free action. In political economics, the connection between human factors, their origins, & subsequent actions depends on the mechanisms of the social system, & society's economic aspect provides the framework for these connections. * The application of M. Shapiro's personal questionnaire (PQ) method of problem assessment ("A Method of Measuring Psychological Change Specific to the Individual Psychiatric Patient," British Journal of Medical Psychology, 1961, 34, 151-155) to couples therapy is illustrated via a case study. It is shown how the three most common designs in psychotherapy outcome research—single case, multiple single cases, & traditional group—can each incorporate the PQ, & in many instances, be strengthened by its inclusion. 1 Table, 30 References. Bruhn, John G. (U Texas Medical Branch, Galveston 77550). The Clinical Sociologist as a Health Broker. Clinical Sociology Review, 1987, 5, 168-179

† One of the key aspects that distinguish clinical sociologists from other sociologists is the former's more active role in intervention & change. The clinical sociologist performs several functions of a "health broker." The role of health broker & the opportunities it provides for clinical sociologists, especially in large organizations, are discussed. 1 Table, 2 Figures, 18 References. HA

Byers, Bryan D. (Office of Prosecuting Attorney Saint Joseph County, South Bend IN 46601). Uses of Clinical Sociology in Crisis Intervention Practice. Clinical Sociology Review, 1987, 5, 102-118

* Crisis intervention is a practice-oriented set of procedures designed to offer someone experiencing incapacitating stress emotional first aid. Concepts & ideas found in the sociological tradition are applicable to crisis intervention practice. There are similar characteristics between crisis intervention & clinical sociology as change strategies. Particularly, the ideas found under the sociological/social-psychology purview serve well in crisis intervention. The interpretation of crisis events is a social act, in that the individual experiencing the crisis is influenced through social circumstances, which also play a vital role in crisis intervention. Intervention strategies are offered that integrate aspects of clinical sociology. The crisis intervention steps include crisis assessment, information gathering, control, direction, progress assessment, & referral. Through these procedures, the intervener may work with the client toward the goal of socioemotional stability. 39 References. Modified HA

Conto, Richard A. (Vanderbilt U, Nashville TN 37240). Participatory Research: Methodology and Critique. Clinical Sociology Review, 1987, 5, 83-90

* The epistemology of participatory research relates knowledge to action, especially the production of knowledge & political action to redress inequality. Characteristics of participatory research are identified, & three research efforts that exemplify them in varying degrees are described. The tenets of participatory research suggest guidelines for degrees, the conduct of inquiry for social scientists interested in the relation of research to increased political participation, & improved human services. 11 References. Heint, Peter (32 Muschamp Rd, London SE15 4LE England). The Interactional Sculpt: Examples from a Training Seminar. Journal of Family Therapy, 1987, 9, 2, May, 189-198

† Theoretical & practical issues related to the concept of interactional scripting are discussed, with focus on the critical elements of circularity & congruence. The technique of combining individual work with family sculpting to translate an internal image of family relationships into an external "sculpt" via interactions between therapist & client is demonstrated using case examples from a training group of mental health professionals & family therapy students (N not provided) at a West German U in 1985. Three therapeutic techniques using sculpting are examined: symbolic-intuitive, scenic, & script transfer. The success of these methods suggests that interactional work can greatly enhance the congruence of a sculpt & the impact of the sculpting experience. Applications to family therapy are suggested, along with recommendations for further research. 13 References. K. Hyatt

Kassop, Mark (Bergen Community Coll, Paramus NJ 07652). Salvador Minuchin: A Sociological Analysis of His Family Therapy Theory. Clinical Sociology Review, 1987, 5, 158-167

† Various academic disciplines are involved in the analysis of marriage & the family (eg, anthropology, economics, history, psychology, psychotherapy, social work, sociology), but they frequently work in ignorance of the research & theoretical findings of their sister disciplines. An attempt is made to establish a theoretical bridge between sociology & family psychotherapy, since they have much in common. To this end, the work of a prominent family psychotherapist, Salvador Minuchin, is analyzed using two of sociology's theoretical constructs: structural functionalism & symbolic interactionism. The analysis suggests that a fruitful dialogue could be established between these two disciplines, which often use different concepts to reach very similar conclusions. Such an exchange of ideas could foster new insights into classical studies, & promote more joint research projects. 15 References. Modified HA

† An analysis of the use of rituals in social work practice, focusing on the way in which ritual reveals group values & shared meanings at the deepest level & helps to establish & maintain a group's collective identity. The meaning of family rituals is seen as a stabilizing & transforming force, & the use of ritual as an assessment & intervention tool is recommended. Suggestions for clinical applications with individuals, families, & groups are discussed. Modified HA

Porter, Elias H. The Parable of the Spindle. Clinical Sociology Review, 1987, 5, 33-44

† (Originally published in the Harvard Business Review, 1962, May/June.) An application of general systems theory to the analysis of business organizations. This perspective views organizations as information-processing systems, & their human relations problems as the result of information overload. Analysis focuses on how the structure or design of an organization influences its operating characteristics & capacity to handle various conditions of information overload. A parable from the restaurant industry is presented as an illustration. K. Hyatt the agency of revolution & the nature of the proletariat have transformed Marxism's very foundations. Leading Marxists now uphold a leading role for intellectuals to the detriment of the proletariat, thus transforming Marxism into an intellectual movement. At the same time, capitalism as consumerism further undermines the social role of the intellectual by encouraging a lifestyle of unreflective hedonism. 1 Appendix, 36 References. Modified HA

¶ A frequent problem in interpretations of Karl Marx's sixth thesis on Ludwig Feuerbach (1977, original title not provided) is overestimation of the social determination of human substance. A reading of Marx's works does not support this interpretation. It is impossible to exclude individual & personal characteristics from human substance, socialization is not merely a placing in social relations, but also the development of life manifestations & creative potentialities. The resulting monistic alternative to traditional dualistic theories of the relation between biological & social is proposed as a basic methodological principle for Marxism. 11 References. London, Boston, & Melbourne: Kegan Paul International, 1985 [see listing in IRPS No. 41]). This is a revised, English version of a book that appeared in Dutch, with the same title, in 1982. It is an important collection of essays by members of the Amsterdam Collective for Marxist Anthropology. Several contributions attempt to analyze empirical cases using the concepts of Parisian Marxist anthropology. The articles by the two editors are especially interesting, although their dualistic notion of old modes of production is contested. 13 References. C. Waters

¶ A polemic against an influential trend in Japanese Marxist economics, focusing on the theory of enrichment. The sources of ideological disenfranchisement of Japanese Marxists is traced to their penchant for theoretical hermeticism & their divorce from social movements. Japanese Marxists lack the theoretical apparatus & political sensibility to comprehend Japanese prosperity as well as to recognize oppressions at home & abroad. Thus, while maintaining scientific pretension, they fall prey to the dominant ideology of "Japan as number one." Modified AA

¶ An examination of the development of Karl Marx's early views of the state, beginning with his critique of G. W. F. Hegel's doctrine of the state. Marx equated the political with the religious in his analyses. The major goal of his writings was human emancipation to be attained through a social revolution led by the proletariat. Subsequently he turned from criticism of the state to criticism of the economy, working toward a materialist conception of history, in which the state was taken to be an instrument of class rule. 29 References. W. H. Stoddard

Little, Daniel (Colgate U, Hamilton NY 13346). Dialectics and Science in Marx's Capital. ♦ UM Philosophy of the Social Sciences, 1987, 17, 2, June, 197-220.

¶ Recent Marxian scholarship has focused attention on the character of Karl Marx's conception of science. A crucial stumbling block for an empiricist interpretation of Marx's social science is the status of dialectics. To the extent that Marx's method depends heavily on G. W. F. Hegel's dialectical logic, the empiricist interpretation will be implausible, because Hegel's dialectics represent an a priori method that does not depend on empirical research. An empiricist interpretation of Marx's criticisms of Hegel's dialectics as a method of inquiry is supported. First Marx's criticisms of Hegel's philosophical method in his middle writings make plain his mistrust of the dialectical logic; second, examination of Marx's practice as a working scientist in Das Kapital shows that his analysis of capitalism depends on careful empirical & theoretical investigation rather than a dialectical method of inquiry. When Marx uses the concept of dialectics, it is to make a substantive point about the process of historical change rather than a methodological principle of inquiry. A version of scientific realism is attributed to Marx ("Galilean empiricism"), according to which beliefs about the inner physiology of capitalism are discovered & confirmed through rigorous empirical & historical investigation. ¶ An analysis of the social relations of production & their contradiction in African peasant agriculture, which combines the "dull compulsion" (market forces on petty commodity producers with various forms of extra-economic coercion. Two paths of accumulation from below & from above are distinguished, the latter based on possession of, or access to, state power. SC formation & agrarian crisis are investigated through the mechanisms & effects of the two types of accumulation, illustrated by 1983/84 household interview data & land-holding records from villages of Uganda, which provide an extreme but not exceptional case of the agrarian question in contemporary African conditions. 8 Tables, 14 References. ¶ A review essay of a critical examination of Karl Marx's thought by Richard Miller (Analyzing Marx, Princeton, NJ, 1985 [see listing in IRPS No. 41]). Miller sees Marx as rejecting morality &, specifically as rejecting the generality of morality in favor of a plurality of goods to be pursued, from which it is impossible to derive norms valid in all situations. In fact such cases as Athenian slaveholding merely prove the weaker thesis that there are no exceptionless moral norms. So it was possible for Marx to hold the general thesis that slavery was wrong & also to say that it was necessary to avoid worse evils. To will the ultimate communism, was for Marx to will the necessary means, even when this included the institution of slavery. W. H. Stoddard

* In an experiment, business students (N = 192 Ms & 192 Fs) evaluated aggressive humor used by a hypothetical manager in an organizational case. In general, Ms judged the humor funnier & more appropriate in the context than did Fs. Some evidence supporting the intergroup-conflict theory of humor was obtained because funniness ratings were higher when victim sex & manager sex were opposite. Ms rated the humor more appropriate when subordinate (audience) & victim sexes were opposite, while Fs did not. Ms thus seemed to believe others held views consistent with sex-conflict theory. Ms rated humor with a M aggressor more appropriate, suggesting Ms have a more traditional, sex-stereotyped view of aggressive humor than do Fs. Ms & Fs agreed in rating the M manager & F subordinate as the manager sex-subordinate sex combination for which the humor was least appropriate. These findings may reflect the Ss' tendencies to use humor when they assume managerial positions. 1 Table, 18 References. HA

* Although the effect of capital markets on corporate decision making has been of scholarly interest, there have been few detailed analyses of the processes & effects of organized finance capital markets on managerial discretion. The case of the W. T. Grant bankruptcy in 1975 illustrates the mechanisms by which the banking community's organized control of the finance capital markets posed a constraining influence on the firm's decision-making processes. This influence extended to the decision to throw the company into involuntary bankruptcy. The case also illustrates finance capital to be both a unique resource (having no alternatives) & a special relationship that, unlike material capital supplier relationships, has long-term consequences for the borrowing firm. 59 References. † A new approach to research in strategic management/business policy is advocated. Organizational strategy is viewed as praxis, an action concept that involves integrating theory & practice. This advocacy is based on a critique of the existing ideological underpinnings of the field on five criteria: (1) the factual underdetermination of action norms, (2) the universalization of sectional interests, (3) the denial of contradictions & conflicts, (4) the normative idealization of sectional goals, & (5) the naturalization of the status quo. Conceptualizing strategy as praxis, ways are suggested by which the field can reorient itself to lessen its ideological burden. 1 Table, 53 References. HA

† An exploration of the possibility that self-managed firms will become the dominant type of production organization in modern economies in the future. It is suggested that, under appropriate conditions, self-managed firms & economies based on such firms are an inherently superior form of production organization. It is hypothesized that, as bureaucratic controls over public enterprises are relaxed in the attempt to achieve greater efficiency, managers of these enterprises will increasingly rely on the support of employees, which will, in turn, lead to a greater degree of self-management. The success of these enterprises will tend to put pressure on private organizations to adopt similar solutions. 30 References. HA

¶ There has been increased concern for the problem of family violence in recent years, & an accompanying interest in providing services to meet the needs of victims. Clinical sociologists can do much to assure that the development of community resources & empirical research in this area proceed hand in hand. Personal experience in chairing a committee that used social research & knowledge of sociological principles in the development of services for battered wives in a major metropolitan area is reported. Three major intervention strategies were employed in the committee setting: provision of information about social structure & its consequences, to enable members to develop more effective plans; use of sociological principles & data, to make members aware of all relevant aspects of the situation, & involvement of group members & other individuals in the planning process, to maximize the likelihood of their investment in the outcome. Committee activities are discussed as a means of indicating both successes & difficulties with these strategies. 28 References. Modified HA

¶ The theoretical base of clinical sociology is analyzed through Stephen Pepper's root metaphor method (World Hypotheses, Berkeley: U of California Press, 1942). Practice is found to be framed by the analogy between society & a complex ecosystem. The resulting world hypothesis is identified as ecologism, within which the four relatively adequate world hypotheses identified by Pepper (formism, mechanism, contextualism, & organicism) take their place as complementary alternatives differentially informing or guiding practice with respect to the analysis of categories, evaluation of linkages, & intervention at the microsocial level of social actors & mesosocial level of organizations & other integrated social systems, respectively. Examples are drawn from the literature, & key analytical & methodological principles are identified for practice at each level. 1 Table, 26 References. Modified HA

* Through techniques based on the laws of optics (eg, photography, cinema & video), it is possible automatically to produce images that represent the environment, & to arrange subjects, objects, & images in a certain way within space & time. However, such an arrangement is completely upset by the new digital technologies. Instead of a representation of reality, these produce a simulation. Light is no longer involved in the creation of images, it is replaced by language & calculation. The question debated here is whether, as images are acquiring characteristics they never had before & subjects & objects are gaining a new status, reality itself is undergoing a complete change. * Many people believe that a man's moral character is revealed in the construction of his face & similarly that a portrait must conform to character assessments derived from its subject's biography. A number of semiotic questions raised by these suppositions are examined based on a case study of Henry Tuckerman's mid-nineteenth century treatise on The Character and Portraits of Washington (New York: G. P. Putnam, 1859). Motivated by the inconsistency with which George Washington was depicted by different artists, Tuckerman reconstructed the great man's "true" facial appearance from biographical accounts of his moral virtues relying on a respected science of his day: physiognomy. According to the physiognomists, facial appearance is a natural sign of inner character, & the individual's biological makeup accounts for the correspondence between his iconic & verbal portraits. It is speculated that the parallels established by physiognomy might be a special case of analog representation as defined by Claude Lévi-Strauss in Totemism (see SA 13 3-4/65B5940), where opposing moral traits are mapped into opposing physical features. In this light, the natural face of a great man becomes a screen on which his society's deepest & most cherished values are projected. 11 Illustrations, 39 References. Modified AA

* A discussion of the verbal environment for visual images that is provided by captions, in terms of the general theory of social constructivism. It is argued that society is an emergent phenomenon that is constituted in the process of joint action. This process is constitutive of all reality & generates the significant forms of human perception. Although the constructivist approach to social phenomena has concentrated on verbal forms, it is suggested that images as well as words are socially constructed concepts, & this construction can have its own influence on linguistic processes. 11 Figures, 59 References. ANNALS OF TOURISM RESEARCH focuses on the academic perspectives of tourism. To strive for a theoretical position and a practical balance, the journal encourages contributions from various disciplines and serves as a forum through which these may interact. In this way, ANNALS OF TOURISM RESEARCH expands the frontiers of knowledge and contributes to the literature of tourism. To this end, ANNALS OF TOURISM RESEARCH both structures and is structured by research efforts of a multidisciplinary community of scholars.

ANNALS OF TOURISM RESEARCH Provides:

- Coverage of Worldwide Developments in Tourism
- Diverse Scholarly Contributions
- Contributions from Experts from Around the World
- Editorial Coverage in 16 Different Disciplines
- Abstracts and Editorials in both English and French

Supplements containing abstracts of papers presented at various associations. The title page of each Supplement contains the name of the association, and the date and place of meeting.

The last, or sometimes only, Supplement is given in the International Review of Public Administration (IRPA), which contains both a listing of book reviews that appear in the journal in this issue (see Index Section for details in alphabetical order). Every IRPA contains its own author, subject, and review indexes.

disciplines

This is the 41st number of the new IRPS series. Presented herewith are 30 book abstracts and a listing of 1,893 book reviews that appeared in the series SA abstracted in Volume 36 Number 1. Book reviews are numbered with a five-digit number with a letter "a" as a prefix, and book abstracts are numbered with a five-digit number and a letter "c" as a prefix.

Each issue has three indexes: a reviewer index, a source publication index, and a book authors and other contributors index.

For core sociology journals, all reviews published are listed here. For non-core journals, only those reviews are listed which represent books written by sociologists, or fall within a sociological area of interest. In some cases, the reviewer's attitude toward the book reviewed is assessed and noted as (++) Very Favorable, (+) Favorable, (0) Noncommittal, (-) Unfavorable, or (--) Very Unfavorable.

Readers of IRPS have been aware that, worldwide, there are three serials devoted primarily to reviewing books published by and for sociologists. These are:

Contemporary Sociology, published by the American Sociological Association (1722 N Street NW, Washington DC 20036)

SeleSociologia, published by Gianfranco Morra (Via Belle Arti 42, 40126 Bologna, Italy)

Soziologische Revue, under the editorship of Johannes Weiss of the Gesamthochschule Kassel FB5 (Heinrich-Platt-Strasse 40, 3500 Kassel, Federal Republic of Germany)

Effective with the No. 26 IRPS issue, Soziologische Revue has been added to the book review bibliography. Since all non-English language book titles have been translated into English, for all intents and purposes, a definitive bibliography of books published by and for sociologists in the Western world is now available for English-reading users.

We also wish to point out that reviewing sections have declined in major core sociology serials, and a new medium the 'newsletter,' is gradually entering the void thus created. Every effort is being made to locate newsletters that carry book reviews, and secure permission to have the reviews listed in the IRPS. We welcome information as to where and by whom such newsletters are published.

Vol 65 in the series Boston Studies in the Philosophy of Science (series editors, Robert S. Cohen & Marx W. Wartofsky), this collection of essays treats the social nature of science within a framework created by the tension between such concepts as criticism & tolerance, democracy & control of power, & expertise & elitism, with critical emphasis on the theories of Karl Popper & Michael Polanyi, in 34 Chpts with Prefaces by the editors & author. (1) Introduction: Science in Its Social Setting reflects on rationalism & romanticism, professionalization & socialization, & school reform, with particular reference to the ideas of P. Snow. (2) The Present State of the Philosophy of Science. (3) Was Wittgenstein Really Necessary? (4) Epistemology as an Aid to Science. (5) Externalism. (6) The Autonomy of Science: discusses arguments for internality vs externality of science, autonomy vs heteronomy of the scientist, & the different methods for a sociology of science. (7) The Legitimation of Science. (8) Sociologism in Philosophy of Science: examines the shift in the problem of knowledge from individual psychology to sociology & its negative consequences for rational moralism. (9) Revolutions in Science: Occasional or Permanent? (10) Cultural Change in Science. (11) Storage and Communication of Knowledge: argues that scientific literature is more a channel of communication than a repository of knowledge, & that current journal & book publication procedures prevent it from functioning properly. Proposals for reforms are given, particularly for scientific clearing-houses with quality control. (12) Economics of Scientific Publications: examines the operations of book markets & small quality markets, & considers ways that scientific publishing can avoid being lost in the gap between them. (13) Revising the Referee System. (14) Scientific Schools and Their Success: discusses relationships between scientific schools, institutions, & paradigms, & various criteria for calling a theory scientific. Special attention is given to the theories of Thomas S. Kuhn & Karl Popper. (15) Genius in Science. (16) Scientists as Sleepwalkers: considers the question of whether scientists succeed at what they do because of predestination or luck, or because they know what they are doing. (17) The Logic of Scientific Inquiry. (18) The Choice of Scientific Problems. (19) Between Metaphysical Methodology. (20) Research Project: discusses inductivist vs critical theories of scientific research & considers methods of evaluating research projects. (21) The Methodology of Research Projects: A Sketch. (22) Continuity and Discontinuity in the History of Science. (23) Three Aspects of the Renaissance of Science. (24) On Explaining the Trial of Galileo. (25) The Origins of the Royal Society. (26) The Ideological Impact of Newton. (27) Sir John Herschel's Philosophy of Success. (28) What Makes for a Scientific Golden Age? (29) Max Weber's Scientific Vocation: examines Weber's attitude toward science as a vocation in an age of disenchantment, & concludes that for Weber the only reasons for committing oneself to the pointless search of science were to be found in investment of work & one's own obsession. (30) On Pursuing the Unsolvable. (31) Faith Has Nothing to Do with Rationality. (32) Rationality and the Tu Quoque Argument: see SA 23 5/75H5663. (33) Technology and Scientific Progress. Archer, John & Lloyd, Barbara (Lancashire Polytechnic, Preston PR1 2TQ GB), SEX AND GENDER (revised edition), ix+355pp. MASI, New York, NY: Cambridge U Press, LC 84-20038, ISBN 0-521-26497-9.

Cloth,$32.50 Paper,$10.95

Revised version, adding some new material, of a summary of recent British & US research on the societal (gender) & biological (sex) differences between Ms & Fs, in 10 Chpts with the author's Preface. (1) Comparative Views and Psychological Research: examines some common beliefs about the nature of men & women & how these have influenced psychological research. Various research strategies are summarized & a distinction is made between the concepts "sex" & "gender" on the basis of attributions rather than either biological or social determinants. (2) Men and Women: Three Views from the Social Sciences: considers some commonsense ideas about the nature of scientific investigation, & examines how they influence the evaluation & credibility of three diverse ways of studying Ms & Fs: demographic approach, psychometric research, & the social-psychological study of stereotypes. (3) Physical Sex Differences: Evolution, Development, and Cultural Significance: examines the origins of sex & the evolution of differences in animals & humans, focusing on the development of human physical sex differences from the prenatal phase through adulthood, & variations in sexual development are also examined. Ways that M-F sex differences are elaborated & used to convey gender meanings & societal values are described. (4) Sexuality: Psychobiology, Psychoanalysis, and Sociology: discusses human sexual experience from three different perspectives: psychobiology, psychoanalysis, & sociology. The reciprocal relationship between sexuality & social roles/values is examined. (5) Aggression, Violence, and Power: offers empirical data from a number of published studies on gender differences in aggression & violence. Psychologists' biological & environmental explanations for the difference are examined, along with the nature of M-F power relations. (6) Fear, Anxiety, and Mental Health: examines gender differences in emotion (primarily fear & anxiety) & mental health in terms of social attitudes. Official mental health statistics from the US (1968, 1980) & GB (1980) are analyzed, & sources of bias that might affect their reliability are explored. (7) The Family: explores some family issues, particularly the differential impact of marriage on Ms & Fs, & the family's structure, internal roles, & social functions, with emphasis on its childrearing function. (8) Work, Intelligence, and Achievement: examines national statistics verifying that Ms do earn more than their F counterparts in both the US & GB, & explores gender differences in intellectual abilities, achievement motivation, & occupational aptitude. (9) Growing Up: Male & Female: reviews various developmental theories on the psychological development of gender. The biological-conditioning (nature-nurture) debate is reviewed, along with some "stage" theories of the developmental lifespan & cognitive-developmental approaches, which emphasize complex interaction between person & environment. (10) Social Change and the Future: reviews how using "gender" to denote social difference & "sex" to refer to biological ones enhances the possibilities for changing relations between Ms & Fs. It is argued that the androgynous society is not likely to become a reality, since human social organization seen demand some form of group differentiation. Nonetheless, gender differences can be minimized, & stereotypical thinking about gender reduced. Beginning in early childhood, some strategies for change are offered. An intergroup relations theoretical framework is used to consider the implications for change in gender constructs, with focus on power inequality & conflicts between gender groups, requirements for gender group membership, & increasing the value of women's achievements, characteristics, & unrealized potential. 537 References.

A study of part-time work & of Fs' role in the labor market, in 6 Ch with an authors' Introduction. (1) Part-Time Work in a Changing Labour Market. (2) Manufacturing Industry. (3) Welfare State. (4) Attitudes of Employers. (5) Theoretical Perspectives. (6) Questions of Policy: Based on 1979-1981 fieldwork in the city of Coventry, GB, the conditions of part-time work in four manufacturing industries (telecommunications, mechanical engineering, textiles, & baking) & three public services (health, education, & social services) are described. A theoretical framework for analyzing part-time work is developed. It is argued that the labor market is becoming increasingly structured toward part-time work, which is highly exploitative & gender-specific: part-time workers are overwhelmingly Fs. This raises general policy questions concerning equal opportunities & the future structure of work. 14 Tables, 1 Figure, 120 References.

* A collection of papers originally presented along with those of a companion work, Women and the Life Cycle at the British Sociological Association (BSA) 1986 conference on "Sociology of the Life Cycle" (held at Loughborough U of Technology), this twenty-fifth vol in the BSA's Explorations in Sociology series explores the resurgence of interest by sociologists in the life cycle of the family & presents different approaches to studying it, in III PARTS & 12 Chpts, with the editors' Introduction. PART I - THEORETICAL APPROACHES - contains (1) Chris Harris The Individual and Society A Processual Approach examines the presumptions underlying the sociological study of aging, & proposes a reconceptualization of individual aging as movement over time through social space, & (2) Michael Murphy Measuring the Family Life Cycle Concepts, Data and Methods offers a review of the life cycle literature, summarizes the images, beliefs, & debates surrounding the concept, & argues that since the traditional family life cycle model applies to only 50% of GB's population, its exclusive use may hinder understanding of the demographic aspects of family change. PART II - POPULAR IDEOLOGIES - includes (3) Paul Bellaby The Perpetuation of a Folk Model of the Life Cycle and Kinship in a Pottery Factory uses data from a 30-month ethnographic study of a large pottery firm in Stoke-on-Trent, GB, to demonstrate how the mental constructs of the life cycle & ideas about kinship are used by both workers & management (N = 248) to understand, explain, predict, & legitimate behavior, with focus on work organization, sickness & absence, & gender relations, (4) Jacqueline Burgoyne Rethinking the Family Life Cycle Sexual Divisions Work and Domestic Life in the Post-War Period reviews popular debates about the state of the family that have existed in GB since WWII, with focus on moral & social issues surrounding the domestic division of labor, women's employment, fathers' involvement in childcare, & marriage cohabitation trends, (5) Rory Williams Images of Age and Generation among Older Aberdonians uses interview data from 70 people aged 60+ in Aberdeen, Scotland, to describe 5 concepts of age early old age is liberation, a setback, or a repairing of defenses, & late old age as either resistable or a surrender, (6) Peter Wright The Social Construction of Babyhood The Definition of Infant Care as a Medical Problem describes how the notion of babyhood was socially constructed in GB around 1900 & came to be a focus of medical attention, exemplifying how social institutions can tailor popular understanding & legitimize interventions into private lives & social relations, & (7) Ronnie Finkenbergh Life Cycle, Trajectory or Pilgrimage? A Social Production Approach to Marxism, Metaphor and Mortality criticizes past sociology particularly Marxist approaches, for their "death-denying naturalism" & argues that death is central to any account of the life experience. PART III - RESOURCES AND TRANSFERS - concludes with (8) David Cheal Intergenerational Transfers and Life Course Management Towards a Socio-Economic Perspective explodes some popular beliefs about the distribution of resources & the significance of government benefits through an exploration of the history of government transfer payments in Canada, the US, & GB, & proposes a theory of intergenerational transfer as the basis for developing alternative models that are cultural, historical, & based on theories of action, (9) Janet Finch Family Obligations and the Life Course examines support, aid, & assistance obligations between adult kin in GB using a life course perspective, conceptualizing them as either moral norms or negotiated commitments, (10) Angela Dale The Effect of Life Cycle on Three Dimensions of Stratification uses data from GB's 1979 General Household Survey (N = about 10,000) to develop a household categorization scheme based on family life cycle stage, & examines the effects of each stage on 3 dimensions of social stratification-labor market access, net disposable income, & household assets, (11) Lydia Morris The Life Cycle and the Labor Market in Hartlepool investigates the impact of life cycle stage on M's & F's labor market involvement, using data from a study of 40 married couples in Hartlepool, GB, & showing how declining labor market conditions affect family development, specifically, gender roles, gender identity, & intergenerational patterns of job transmission, & (12) Lawrence Took & Janet Ford The Impact of Mortgage Arrears on the Working Careers of Home Owners-questions assumptions underlying the "working career" concept, ie, that families continue to trade up in the housing market as their opportunities & resources improve, illustrating the dangers of such assumptions with interview data from 40 GB property owners experiencing problems with mortgage repayments, a phenomena that is increasing & is often underreported by building societies. 3 Tables, 6 Figures, Bibliog of 413 items

‡ An exploration of the current problems that science & technology (S&T) & innovation present to industrialized countries, & how they differ from those of developing countries, in III PARTS & 12 Chpts with a Foreword by Amadou-Mahtar M'Bow & an Introduction by the author. The role of S&T in social evolution is discussed, & some predictions are made regarding how this might change in the future. The question of whether science is "a cultural luxury or a social necessity" is explored. PART I - CONCEPTS - contains (1) Science for knowledge, (2) Science for Technology, (3) Technology for Development, & (4) Development for What? explores the relationship between technology & science & their application to development problems. Changes in the role of research & in the value of scientific knowledge in the US are examined, & shown to be related to shifts in ethical, political, & ideological value systems, the impact on the development process is summarized. The idea of the endogenous development of S&T is introduced, & some internal contradictions in the concept are exposed. PART II - TRENDS - includes (5) Basic Sciences, (6) Natural Systems, & (7) Technologies examines the state of the art in science (with emphasis on advances in biology, chemistry, & physics) & technology (focusing on information, biotechnology, energy, & materials). Changes in the nature of S&T, & the public's conceptions of them, since the 1970s are explored. The current status of the earth's natural systems is investigated, along with how these systems are interrelated, & changes that are occurring as a result of human action are noted. It is emphasized that planning for the future must involve planning for uncertainty & change. PART III - CHOICES - includes (8) The Scientific Community, (9) The Public and the Media, (10) The Nation State, (11) The Transnational Enterprise, & (12) The International Dimension explores the roles of the principal actors involved in shaping the relationship of S&T to society over the coming years. The increased realization of the global nature of scientific-technological development issues is examined. Though it is emphasized that developing countries must shoulder the primary responsibility for fostering endogenous scientific & technological development, international collaborative networks should assist them in this venture through promoting education, training, & shared problem solving, some efforts in this direction are examined. 9 Tables

(Cloth,$39.50 Paper,$14.95)

A collection of 8 essays that seek to develop a feminist approach in social theory & social critique with an editors' Introduction. (1) Linda Nicholson Feminism and Marx: Integrating Kinship with the Economic examines ambiguities & problems in Karl Marx's approach to the family & the role of Ex & relates these to the historical context in which Marx wrote. (2) Nancy Fraser 'What's Critical about Critical Theory?' The Case of Habermas and Gender discusses Jurgen Habermas's critical social theory & its 'blind spots' as regards Ex interests. (3) Iris Marion Young 'Impartiality and the Civic Public: Some Implications of Feminist Critiques of Moral and Political Theory' argues that emancipatory politics must break with current political theory, some suggestions for an alternative concept of public life are put forward. (4) Seyla Benhabib 'The Generalized and the Concrete Other: The Kohlberg-Gilligan Controversy and Feminist Theory' attempts to develop a feminist contribution to moral philosophy, through an examination of the controversy surrounding the work of Carol Gilligan & of Lawrence Kohlberg on moral judgment & moral development. (5) Maria Markus 'Women, Success and Civil Society: Submission to, or Subversion of the Achievement Principle' investigates aspects of so-called "success avoidance" by Ex, using empirical findings from 2 studies of Hungarian Ex (1: engineers (N not given), & Ex of differing backgrounds (N = 861)) conducted in the 1970s. (6) Isaac D. Balbus 'Disciplining Women: Michel Foucault and the Power of Feminist Discourse' confronts Michel Foucault's genealogy with feminist psychoanalytic theory. (7) Judith Butler 'Variations on Sex and Gender: Beauvoir, Wittig and Foucault' compares the approaches of Simone de Beauvoir, French feminist Monique Wittig, & Michel Foucault to the questions of to what degree gender is chosen & to what degree it is culturally constructed. (8) Drucilla Cornell & Adam Thurnschwell 'Feminism, Negativity, Intersubjectivity' analyzes the negative concept of "the feminine" developed in the work of Julia Kristeva, & ways in which this was influenced by Jacques Lacan's interpretations of Sigmund Freud.

* This collection of 8 essays that examine the impact of scientific knowledge on social relations from a sociological perspective: the Sociology of the Sciences Yearbook 1986 is presented in III PARTS, each introduced by the editors, with a Preface by the editors. PART I - THE DESIGN OF KNOWLEDGE SOCIETY includes (1) Gernot Bohme & Nico Stehr 'The Growing Impact of Scientific Knowledge on Social Relations' points out that in contemporary societies, knowledge has assumed a status equal to property & labor as a base of society's constitutive relations. Theoretical implications of this development are explored, & existing theories, especially the theory of postindustrial society, are critically examined. A need is seen for a theory of the production, distribution, & reproduction of knowledge, & (2) Michael Hammond 'Finite Human Capacities and the Pattern of Social Stratification in a Knowledge Society' suggests that the finite human capacity for information processing is a major determinant of social structure, moreover, the allocation of cognitive resources is often affectively guided & thus influenced by the limits of human affective resources. PART II - THE SOCIAL ROLE OF MEN OF KNOWLEDGE contains (3) Gernot Bohme 'Demarcation as a Strategy of Exclusion: Philosophers and Sophists' proposes that participation in knowledge is often a criterion for membership in social groups, & explores the implication that acceptance or rejection of knowledge claims can be used to control social boundaries, illustrating this thesis with a case study of Plato's campaign against the sophists of ancient Greece, (4) Thomas F. Gieryn & Anne E. Egert 'Scientists Protect Their Cognitive Authority: The Status Degradation Ceremony of Sir Cyril Burt' proposes that the controversy over Sir Cyril Burt's research methods & over accusations of research fraud against him demonstrates protection of the cognitive authority of science by exclusion of Burt from the status of scientist. Eight stages of reaction are definable: ignorance of the crime, denial of the charges, stacking the jury, plea bargaining, blaming the accusers, perpetrator as victim, sentence, & recovering the authority of science, & (5) Aaron Cicourel 'The Reproduction of Objective Knowledge: Common Sense Reasoning in Medical Decision Making' shows how medical diagnosis transforms the folk categories used by the patient into the form of objective medical knowledge, in an analysis of MD-patient & MD-MD dialogues about one case. PART III - PROCESSES OF SCIENTIFICATION - concludes with (6) Richard V. Ericson & Clifford Shearing 'The Scientification of Police Work' suggests that the police possess special powers to determine truth. The ultimate implication: police organizational practices is the totally policed society, as electronic data collection, storage, & analysis generate massive bodies of information & misinformation through which social control is dispersed throughout society. Recent concerns of Canadian policing planners illustrate this thesis, (7) Goran Wallen 'The Scientification of Architecture' points to parallels between architectural practice & philosophy of science in the history of Swedish architecture in the twentieth century: an early period of emerging city planning (1900-1920), a functionalist period based on positivist beliefs (1920-1950), a period of structuralist & systems architecture (1950-1970), & finally a crisis period (after 1970). Throughout the century architecture has grown increasingly scientific in character, & (8) Angela Metropoulos O'Rand 'Knowledge Form and Scientific Community: Early Experimental Biology and the Marine Biological Laboratory' examines the role of marine biology laboratories as an institutional form in the emergence of modern biological science through historical case study of the Marine Biological Laboratory in Woods Hole, Mass., between 1890 & 1910. U.S. researchers at Woods Hole advanced the research program of experimental embryology, which they imported from Germany & other European nations.

* A study of marital violence, in III PARTS & 13 Chpts. PART I presents the factual data that were gathered in (1) Introduction gives background to the study, which was conducted in Bristol, GB in 1979, & describes its three stages: a preliminary feasibility study, an age study, which surveyed those services likely to be approached by victims of marital violence, eg, hospitals, Marriage Guidance Councils, a Citizens' Advice Bureau, & a Council on Alcoholism, & a practitioner study in which lawyers, MDs, social workers, & health visitors (N = 50 from each group) were interviewed using structured questionnaires, (2) How Much Marital Violence Comes to the Attention of Public Services? attempts to estimate the amount of marital violence in GB based on the study findings, & (3) Some Social Characteristics of Victims of Marital Violence describes the victims' characteristics, eg, length of marriage, number of children, SES, & pattern of agency utilization. PART II - examines practitioners' perceptions of marital violence in (4) Problems of Definition - investigates the various definitions of marital violence used by different practitioners, (5) Problems of Explanation - reviews practitioners' assessment of the factors that precipitate marital violence, including personality factors, stress factors, & other external circumstances, illustrating them with case studies, (6) Questions of Evidence - discusses the problem of proving marital violence: physical evidence, (7) Issues of Privacy and Confidentiality examines how practitioners' concern for privacy may affect the flow of information, (8) Ambivalence in Victims and Practitioners - considers practitioners' reactions to Ex who change their minds after requesting help, & how they explain it, (9) Ignorance of the Law Is No Excuse - evaluates practitioners' legal knowledge in this area, (10) Role Definition outlines how practitioners view their own professional roles in cases of marital violence, & (11) Perceptions of Other Services - presents practitioners' evaluations of existing services other than their own, & discusses how this affects the likelihood that they will refer clients to them. PART III - examines the policy implications of victims' patterns of help-seeking behavior in (12) The Significance of Agency Choice - analyzes the factors that influence victims' choice of service among those already discussed & others, eg, the police, women's refuges, & (13) Some Policy Considerations - reviews the different ideologies that influence policy in this area & argues the need for greater public attention to the problem of marital violence. * Second in the series Plenum Studies in Work and Industry (Ivar Berg & Arne L. Kalleberg, series editors), this vol is an interdisciplinary effort exploring how workers & managers in 14 US industries attempt to control the implementation & outcomes of technological change. in IV PARTS with 16 Chpts, editor's Preface, & a Foreword by Ray Marshall. PART I - INTRODUCTION - contains (1) Daniel B. Cornfield: Workers, Managers and Technological Change. PART II - TOWARD UNILATERAL MANAGERIAL CONTROL - discusses industries where management has gained more control of the labor process at the point of production through job deskilling, technical control, & bureaucratic control, in (2) Robert J. Thomas: Microchips and Macroharvests: Labor-Management Relations in Agriculture. (3) Arne L. Kalleberg, Michael Wallace, Karyn A. Fosco, Kevin T. Leicht, & Hans-Helmut Ehm: The Eclipse of Craft: The Changing Face of Labor in the Newspaper Industry. discusses the postwar transformations in corporate structures of newspapers, which form the backdrop for technological change in the industry, analyzes the impact of technological change (particularly relative to the decline of craftsmanship & skills in the manufacturing phases of production), & considers the effect of these changes on labor-management relations, including a decline in unionization & a modification of the existing union structure. (4) Gordon Betcherman & Douglas Rebne: Technology and Control of the Labor Process: Fifty Years of Longshoring on the U.S. West Coast. (5) Vern Baxter: Technological Change and Labor Relations in the United States Postal Service-outlines major technological changes in the post office & compares postal labor relations before & after the 1971 reorganization. The transition to scientific management strategy & collective bargaining is claimed to have resulted in substantial gains in management control, but at a relatively great cost. (6) Daniel B. Cornfield, Polly A. Phipps, Diane P. Bites, Deborah K. Carter, Trudie W. Coker, Kathleen E. Kitzmiller, & Peter B. Wood: Office Automation, Clerical Workers, and Labor Relations in the Insurance Industry-examines the growing disjunction between management & labor arising from rationalization through office automation & the imposition of impersonal labor controls, on one side, & the development of an occupation- & gender-based dual consciousness of deteriorating work conditions, on the other. (7) Kent D. Peterson: Computerized Instruction, Information Systems, and School Teachers: Labor Relations in Education. & (8) Arthur B. Stata: Technology, Air Traffic Control, and Labor-Management Relations-shows how the evolution of air traffic control technology exacerbates the severity of labor-management strife in the 1981 strike, conceived as an irreconcilable conflict over human agency vs machine reliance. union input in decisions about technological change, & negative reviews rooted in air control technologies. PART III - TOWARD LABOR MANAGEMENT COOPERATION? - examines industries in which diverse forums have been established for labor participation in company- & industry-wide managerial decision making, such as joint committees for problem research & resolution, joint lobbying efforts, & worker representation on company boards of directors, in (9) Richard A. Couto: Changing Technologies and Consequences for Labor in Coal Mining. (10) Michael Indergaard & Michael Cushion: reviews the history of labor relations in the auto industry, from open conflict to adversarial accommodation & finally, to cooperative relations, & shows that the declining power of labor & recent subordination in cooperative arrangements are due to major structural changes in the world economy & technological change. (11) Dennis A. Ahlburg, Anne E. Carey, Bruce A. Lundgren, Sandra E. Barrett, & Lawrence D. Anderson: Technological Change, Market Decline, and Industrial Relations in the U.S. Steel Industry. (12) Gerald Gordon, Sally Moulton, Tom Wachtell, John Francis, & Ashraf Zahedi: Computer Based Automation and Labor Relations in the Construction Equipment Industry. (13) Arthur R. Schwartz, James D. (14) David Lewin: Technological Change in the Public Sector: The Case of Sanitation Service. & (15) Dick Batten & Sara Schoonmaker: Deregulation, Technological Change, and Labor Relations in Telecommunications: examines the history & interdependency of regulatory politics, technological changes, & their impact on industrial organization & labor relations in the telecommunications industry, & argues that technological innovation & increased nonunion competition, combined with a decrease in the market share of American Telegraph & Telephone, have made cooperative labor-management arrangements imperative. PART IV - CONCLUSION - contains (16) Daniel B. Cornfield: Labor Management Cooperation or Managerial Control? Emerging Patterns of Labor Relations in the United States: reviews four historical periods of increased labor-management cooperation in US industries, & argues from the studies in this vol that industries with formal cooperation today are characterized by three conditions: worker interest vested in the employer, high unionization & bargaining strength, & the presence of an external threat to the viability of the industry. 41 Tables, 3 Figures.

Cloth, $24.95

* This work, in IV PARTS & 6 Chpts, uses interview & observational data to explore the systems of formal prison administration operating in higher-custody prisons in 3 states: Tex., Calif., & Mich. Introduction explicates the study's underlying assumption: prisons need not resemble "Hobbesian states of nature" or serve as "hellish traps for society's refuse," but can & should be governed at acceptable human & financial costs. PART I - UNDERSTANDING PRISONS - includes (1) The Governability of Prisons: provides an overview of the sociological literature on prisons, summarizing the predominant views on crime & corrections, the inmate society, & prison management, & tracing the evolution of US prison sociology from the 1940s to the present, especially its adequacy in exploring four correctional issues: prison violence, participative prison management, inmate treatment, & administrative change, & (2) The Quality of Prison Life: investigates how prisons differ in their levels of amenity, service, & order, with focus on the last since it is the most readily quantifiable, leading to the conclusion that the most salient influence on quality of prison life is organizational & management practices. PART II - GOVERNING PRISONS - contains (3) Governing Prisons in Three States: reviews the three models of correctional management employed in each system: the Tex control model, the Mich responsibility model, & the Calif consensual model & discusses the main elements, evolution, & defects of each, illuminating administrative variations through case studies of 4 prisons. (4) Correctional Philosophy and Leadership: explores differences in the correctional philosophies underlying each system, but notes that they are fundamentally similar in that they each endorse a common body of beliefs known as the "keeper philosophy," which enhances the self-image of correctional workers, but also fosters certain dysfunctional myths about the nature of their jobs, & (5) Correctional Change: The Case of Texas Prisons: examines the decline of the Tex prison system during the mid-1980s, & attributes it to three factors: a major flaw in the "building tender" control model, a landmark court case, & changes in personnel & managerial philosophy. PART III - IMPROVING PRISONS - consists of (6) The Prison as a Constitutional Government: reiterates that the best way to improve the quality of prison life is to think of prisons in terms of mini-governments rather than levy & his criticism of Vilfredo Pareto. & (8) Liberalism and totalitarianism: covers Aron's 1929 writing about democracy & totalitarianism. PART III - THE WAR YEARS - surveys Aron's work as a journalist for the Free French in England & summarizes his writings in (9) La France libre & (10) Chronique de France. (11) Man and the Tyrants & (12) The Renovation of France. PART IV - THE OLD WAR - contains (13) The Journalist reviews Aron's work as a columnist for Combat & Le Figaro. (14) The Rassemblement du Peuple français discusses Aron's activities in the Gaullist political party, his opinions on the constitutional issue of 1947 & his relations with Charles de Gaulle. (15) The Break with Sartre. (16) The Great Scheme looks at Aron's book on the postwar conflict between East & West. (17) The Wars of the Twentieth Century describes the book Les Guerres en train (translated into English as The Century of Total War, 1954). Paris: Gallimard, 1951. & its reception. (18) The Future of Europe discusses France's role in the postwar creation of economic & military alliances in Western Europe. (19) France and the Empire summarizes Aron's publications on the crises in Algeria & Indochina. & (20) The Opinion of the Intellectuals reviews the book attacking first French intellectuals L'Opinion des intellectuels (The Opinion of the Intellectuals), Paris: Calmann-Lévy, 1957. & Chronological Table, 1905-1955. Bibliography, 1907-1955. A. Aron's Publications in French, 1905-1955. B. English Translations and Writings in English, 1905-1955. C. A detailed examination of the historical development of polls & surveys in the US with attention to the commercial, political, & academic influences on that development, as well as the most important individuals & institutions in 11 PARTS & 12 Chpts with author's Introduction. PART I - THE ANCESTORS, 1890-1940 - includes (1) The Reformers: Ancestor of Policy: The Social Survey examines the groundbreaking work of Charles Booth & B. Seebohm Rowntree at the turn of the century in England, discusses the etymology of the word "survey," & describes early US survey efforts growing out of social reform movements & government surveys during the Great Depression, focusing on methodological developments. (2) The More Elegant Ancestor of Science: Attitude Measurement in Psychology and Sociology - reviews the origins of the concept "attitude" in social psychology & the development of means for measuring it through questionnaires. & (3) The Most Direct Line: Business, Market Research and Opinion Polling - looks at the beginnings of PO research in the journalistic opinion polls & market research of the 1930s. PART II - THE PREWAR AND WARTIME GENERATION, 1935-1945 - includes (4) The Prewar Years: Academic Entrepreneurship and Survey Poll Data chronicles the early careers of Paul Lazarsfeld, Hadley Cantril, & Rensis Likert. (5) The Wartime Experience in Policy Research focuses on the extended use of PO/attitude research by the US government during WWII to assess domestic & enemy morale & the functioning of civilian programs. (6) The Wartime Experience in Science (1) examines the instrumental & methodological advances gained from experience with wartime research. & (7) The Wartime Experience (2) reviews the major publications coming out of wartime research & their reception in the social-scientific community. At Temple Shalom, a major source of commonality is the construction & elaboration of an identity & "style" based on a "cult of uniqueness"—a shared sense of separateness from the surrounding Jewish community maintained through structural isolation, ideological differentiation, & ritual distinctiveness. (6) Conclusions—examines the goodness-of-fit between Temple Shalom's ideological, ritualistic, & communal expressions & how they affect members' sense of Jewish identity. It is argued that the Temple's ethic of modernization—with its valued liberal ethic, lack of a strong sense of continuity with traditions or knowledge of the past, & emphasis on rational rather than emotional or spiritual dimensions—fails to adequately integrate its members or provide them with a strong Jewish identity. Suggestions for formulating this ethic are provided. Bibliog of 178 items.

* This examination of F friendship, Vol No. 80 in the series Contributions in Women Studies, is based on in-depth, unstructured interviews with 75 Mc & UMc US Fs aged 30-65, in 6 Chpts. (1) Introduction—describes the focus & conditions of the study. (2) Beginnings—Prefriendship and Getting Acquainted—analyzes how friendships between Fs begin, including strategies for getting acquainted, the "budget" of time & effort available for friendship, & reasons why certain groups of potential friends are disregarded. (3) Friendship—Its Substance—discusses the nature of friendship for Fs, different types of friendships, & the importance of talk. (4) The Extraordinary Relationship—examines Fs' ideals of friendship & their roots in the childhood socialization of girls, which is markedly different from that of boys with regard to same-sex friendships. (5) Breakdowns, Repairs, and Endings—investigates how & why friendships end, & the reactions of former friends to such changes. (6) Postscript—sums up the importance of friendship in the life of the modern woman & concludes that it may be increasing, as trends toward residential mobility, divorce, childlessness, & F longevity tend to diminish the centrality of family relationships. Cloth,$37.50

* Originally published in German as Theorie des Kommunikativen Handelns, Band II: Zur Kritik der funktionalistischen Vernunft (Frankfurt: Suhrkamp Verlag, 1981), this translation by Thomas McCarthy of Vol 2 of a fundamental critique of social theory & the construction of a new model of critical theory examines the theoretical presuppositions of George Herbert Mead, Emile Durkheim, & Talcott Parsons, in the process developing a two-tiered model of society, consisting of system & lifeworld, & diagnoses the pathologies of modern society as due to the uncoupling of system & lifeworld, in 4 Chpts with a translator's Preface. (5) The Paradigm Shift in Mead and Durkheim: From Purposive Activity to Communicative Action—analyzes Mead's communication theory, particularly that of the development from subhuman interaction mediated by gestures to symbolically mediated interaction & ultimately role behavior, emphasizing the normative basis of communicative action & its role in relating traditions, norms, & personalities. Durkheim's theory of social integration is analyzed with regard to the origin of morality in the sacred & the linguistification of the sacred, focusing on the development of law. (6) Intermediate Reflections. System and Lifeworld—develops the concept of lifeworld as the background of preknowledge against which all communicative action takes place, as well as the horizon limiting communicative action possibilities, discusses several past theoretical approaches to this concept, & criticizes interpretive sociology for identifying society with the lifeworld, thereby forfeiting its theoretical value. The evolution of society toward greater system complexity is linked to increased differentiation in the lifeworld, with the result being increased subsumation of interaction by system functions & control by nonlinguistic media (money & power) & a consequent replacement of normatively based social integration by system integration. (7) Talcott Parsons: Prob-retical development of Parsons, including the evolution from a theory of action concerned with problems of coordination, motivation, & value orientations to a systems theory. The latter is critically examined, particularly as it pertains to the concept of media-steered interactions, & is faulted for overgeneralizing system complexity to include differentiation of the lifeworld. (8) Concluding Reflections. From Parsons via Weber to Marx—looks back to the discussion in Vol 1 of Weber's theory of modernity & the paradox of bureaucratization, this time from a more developed theory of interchange relations between system & lifeworld. The Marxian theories of reification & ideology are also examined from this perspective, with the conclusion that the problem of today is not so much ideology as the fragmentation of everyday consciousness. A summary discussion reviews the history of critical theory (primarily the Frankfurt school) & shows how those efforts in various disciplines can be improved on by the theory of communicative action.

* Originally published in German as Theorie des Kommunikativen Handelns, Band I: Handlungsrationalität und gesellschaftliche Rationalisierung (Frankfurt: Suhrkamp Verlag, 1981), this translation by Thomas McCarthy of the first vol of a treatise on the foundations of social theory critically examines the concepts of rationality that provide a metatheoretical & methodological basis for social theory (with particular reference to Max Weber), & introduces & develops a concept of communicative rationality, which is proposed to solve principal difficulties in comprehending modern society & diagnosing its pathologies, in 4 Chpts with translator's Introduction & author's Preface. (1) Introduction—Approaches to the Problem of Rationality—analyzes the concept of rationality, illustrates it by contrasting the modern understanding of the world to the mythical, shows the connection between the theory of rationality & social theory, demonstrates how four basic sociological concepts of action have certain implications for rationality, as do sociological methodologies of interpretive understanding, & argues the need for a theory of communicative action emphasizing communicative, as opposed to cognitive-instrumental, rationality. (2) Max Weber's Theory of Rationalization—discusses Weber's theory of the rationalization of religious worldviews & the value spheres of science, morality, & art, & the development of bureaucracy in capitalist society, distinguishing the different concepts of rationality ambiguously employed & finding fault with Weber's restrictions of his action theory to purposive rationality. (3) Intermediate Reflections. Social Action, Purposive Activity, and Communication—criticizes Weber's theory of action & develops as a response the concept of communicative action, utilizing speech act theory to demonstrate the central role of criticizable validity claims in action oriented to understanding, & the necessary assumption in all speech acts of a background of implicit knowledge, characterized as the lifeworld. (4) From Lukács to Adorno. Rationalization as Reification traces the Western Marxist reception of Weber's paradox of rationalization, from the views of Georg Lukács to those of Theodor W. Adorno, criticizing it for being bound to a philosophy of consciousness & demonstrating the need for a shift of paradigm to communicative action.

Cloth,$30.00 Paper,$11.00

* This book examines the worldwide political turmoil of the late 1960s, focusing on France in May 1968 & the US in May 1970, discusses its causes & consequences, & attempts to place it in the context of a history of such spontaneous global upheavals, in III PARTS with 6 Chpts & author's Preface. PART I - A GLOBAL ANALYSIS OF 1968 - includes (1) The New Left as a World-Historical Movement—discusses the phenomenon of world-historical movements, looking in particular at the events of 1848, 1905, & 1968, & gives an overview of the universalist character of the New Left of the late 1960s; & (2) Social Movements of 1968—starts with the Tet offensive in Vietnam on 31 Jan 1968 as catalyst & continues to describe student movements throughout the world, as well mini-societies. Forms of prison organization that are likely to maximize order, amenity, & service while minimizing the human & financial costs of improvement are examined. It is argued that no effective rehabilitation can occur unless prison authorities maintain order, the duties of the government toward achieving this are summarized. Good prisons represent society's best moral option for dealing with convicted criminals. PART IV - STUDYING PRISONS - includes Appendix. Prison Research summarizes three major problems in conducting prison research: gaining access, gathering data, & generating interest, & offers some directions for future research. Annotated Bibliography of 65 items.

¶ Originally published in French as Le Développement social de l'intelligence (Paris: InterEditions, 1981), this tenth vol in the International Series in Experimental Social Psychology (series editor, Michael Argyle), translated by Angela St. James-Emler & Nicholas Emler (with the collaboration of Diane Mackie) is presented in 7 Chpts, with a Foreword by the editors & a Preface by Serge Moscovici. (1) The Social Significance of the Study of Intelligence: contrasts two approaches to intelligence: the cognitive psychology of Jean Piaget & the investigation of academic success's social determinants of Pierre Bourdieu. The theoretical gap between them is filled by the psychometric tradition of intelligence testing, though like cognitive psychology, this approach focuses almost wholly on the individual. (2) A Social Definition of Intelligence: reviews sociological approaches to intelligence, which define it as capacity to adapt to the environment. George Herbert Mead, Piaget, & L. S. Vygotsky all have worked in this tradition. A social psychology of intelligence must focus on the constructive nature of social interaction, cognitive prerequisites, the effect of social interaction on individual cognitive development, sociocognitive conflict, social developmental constructivism & modeling theory, social marking, & sociological factors. (3) The Cooperative Game and the Coordination of Interdependent Actions: examines the growth of cognition in cooperative games & through coordination of independent actions in a description of experiments involving 48, 32, 72, & 190 schoolchildren. (4) The Benefits of Sharing: explores how sharing influences growth of the ability to recognize conservation in experiments involving 111, 51, 105, 80, 72, & 231 children. (5) Sociocognitive Conflict: reveals the role of sociocognitive conflict in cognitive development in experiments involving 53, 32, 36, & 15 children. (6) The Coordination of Viewpoints: explores the coordination of different children's representations of space through social interaction in experiments involving 60, 74, 72, 19, 72, 59, & 42 children. (7) Conclusions: presents conclusions drawn from these 21 experiments. A more general theory of cognitive development in social contexts is outlined, & some questions it leaves unanswered are raised. 48 Tables, 18 Figures, 4 Plates, 149 References.

Estes, Richard J., THE SOCIAL PROGRESS OF NATIONS, xvi+221pp, no index, New York, NY: Praeger, LC 84-9802, ISBN 0-03-059582-7.

Cloth, $24.95.

¶ This book is the result of research conducted from 1975 to 1982 in an attempt to develop a paradigm of world progress that would measure the capacity of individual nations to provide basic social & material needs, & that could objectively assess changes in global social provision over time. Methodological considerations in developing the Index for Social Progress (ISP), findings on 107 nations, & recommendations for action are presented in 9 Chpts. (1) Introduction: explains the research motivation & the book's organization. (2) Assessing Global Social Progress: reviews past approaches, including gross national product, projects of the UN & the Organization for Economic Cooperation & Development, Physical Quality of Life Index, & subjective approaches to well-being. (3) The Index of Social Progress: describes the methodological development of the ISP, the criteria it was designed to meet, its initial form in the concept of national social vulnerability, the study's time frame, methods of data collection & statistical weighting, nation-state selection & grouping, field testing & validity, & reliability of the ISP. The ISP is constructed of 44 welfare-relevant social indicators distributed among 11 subindexes: education, health, status of women, defense effort, economics, demography, geography, political stability, political participation, cultural diversity, & welfare effort (further methodological detail provided in 3 Appendixes). (4) Global Trends in Social Provision: presents major findings obtained from applying the ISP to 107 nations over the period 1970-1980, both on a global scale & in 4 developmental & 7 geopolitical regions. Greatest global gains were found in the subindexes of education, status of women, defense effort, & political stability, while setbacks were registered in economics & political participation. In addition, increasing gaps between developed & least-developed nations are indicated. (5) National Social Progress: presents findings for individual nations & profiles nations of greatest & least social progress. (6) Summary of Major Findings: describes conditions pertinent to developed market economies, eastern trading area nations, developing countries (in terms of social gains & losses), & least developed countries, & comments on the social development gap. (7) Problems of Progress in a Critical Decade: discusses factors contributing to lack of social progress in the developing world, including population growth pressures; differential rates of economic expansion; global militarism; human rights violations; global nuclearization; & erosion of the extended family. (8) Since 1980: describes problems continuing since the conclusion of the study, including regional conflicts, political refugees, militarism & nuclearization, & the financing of welfare. (9) The Need for Global Action: Now offers an agenda for global social reform. Appendix A: Indicator Sources and Operational Definitions. Appendix B: Index and Subindex Computational Notes. Appendix C: Raw Score Values of Selected Indicators on the Political Stability, Political Participation, and Geographic Subindexes by Economic Development Grouping and Nation. 42 Tables, 1 Figure, 4 Charts, 214 References.

¶ A vol in the SUNY (State U of New York) Series in Anthropology and Judaic Studies (series editor, Walter P. Zenner), in 6 Chpts with an author's Introduction, this work explores identity construction & maintenance among "ordinary" US Jews from the perspective of a liberal Jew with a nonreligious upbringing. It provides an ethnographic study of a Reform synagogue-Temple Shalom (pseudonym)-located in an affluent metropolitan area on the west coast. A social ethics orientation underlies a phenomenological inquiry based on participant observation & formal, informal interviews (N = 15) with synagogue members & clergy conducted during 1978. Focus is on the tensions between religion & secularism: collectivity & individualism, tradition & modernity, & religious/ethnic cultural/nationalistic self-images that affect Jewish identity, particularly in the US context. (1) The Transformation of Jewish Identity: demonstrates how the ambivalence that Temple Shalom members feel toward their Jewish identity is not uncommon in light of the Jews' long pattern of adaptation to new times & places, & the complex relationship between tradition & modernity. The history of the traditional Jewish society is traced, with focus on its cultural & religious characteristics immediately preceding its dissolution in eighteenth- & nineteenth-century Europe, the effects of modernization, & factors that precipitated the mass migration of Jews to the US following WWII. (2) Temple Shalom: Setting and Reform Context: traces the history of Temple Shalom from its 1947 founding to the present, focusing on its organizational structure, staff, & member characteristics. The nature of the Reform movement in the US is examined in depth to demonstrate its influence on the current identity of the Temple & its members. (3) Ideology and Identity: shows how liberalism, backed by a strong orientation toward social justice & activism, is at the core of Temple Shalom's ideology. Processes through which it is articulated to Temple members are described. Since this ideology frequently mirrors values that congregants held before joining, it allows them to closely identify their liberal views with being Jewish, however, ambiguities concerning the meanings of Judaism & Jewishness persist. Members' conflicts between tradition & modernity are illustrated through the example of their hostility toward the ritual wearing of varmulkes (skullcaps) by adult M members. (4) Ritual and Identity: examines the use of various ritual practices, ceremonies, & objects & how they are instrumental in shaping Jewish identity through standardized values, self-definitions, & social relations. It is shown how ritual, like ideology, is surrounded by ambiguity that complicates identity formation. (5) Community and Identity: demonstrates how Jewish fellowship groups (chavurot) have grown over the past fifteen years, reflecting unfulfilled needs for community within modern Jewish organizations.

Freeman—The Ecology of Organizations: Structural Inertia and Organizational Change—develops an ecological theory of organizational change, which argues for Darwinian rather than Lamarckian mechanisms of social evolution favoring high levels of structural inertia in organizations; & Howard Aldrich—Comment—suggests that clarification of the distinction between "initial state" & "reorganization" of a structure is needed, as well as greater attention to the relative weights of internal & external pressures for reproducibility. INTERPRETIVE SOCIOLOGY - contains Joseph R. Gusfield—Public Problems as Phenomena The Shape of a Humanistic Social Science—describes & argues for a humanistic social science opposed to the natural-scientific model & emphasizing interpretation, illustrating its application with a study of how drunk driving has been constructed as a social problem, & John Katsuse—Comment—attempts to clarify the distinction between the attitude of the interpretive social scientist & the natural attitude of the social actor. ORGANIZATION THEORY - contains Robert G. Eccles & Harrison C. White—Firm and Market Interfaces of Profit Center Control—examines the recent spread of decentralization or divisionalization in large US manufacturing firms & the consequent adoption of portfolio management techniques, & argues that the profit center is the fundamental unit of analysis in both markets & firms, resulting in an interpenetration of markets & hierarchies, & John Padgett—Comment—offers some predictions based on the preceding discussion of portfolio planning, & points out inconsistencies in it. THEORY OF SOCIAL CHANGE - includes Theda Skocpol & Ann Shola Orloff—Explaining the Origins of Welfare States: A Comparison of Britain and the United States, 1880s-1920s—attributes the different development of the welfare state in the US & GB in the early twentieth century to structures & modes of operations of states & political parties, rather than to SE development, Arthur Mann—Comment—emphasizes the need to take into account personal biography when giving historical explanations that rely on politicians' choices, & David L. Featherman—Comment—suggests a quantitative comparative approach to complement the historical comparative approach to studying developmental social change. SOCIOLINGUISTICS - contains William Labov—Language Structure and Social Structure—uses several sociolinguistic studies, especially concerning the vernacular of black Americans, to demonstrate the correspondence between linguistic differentiation & social conflict & the conditions under which a speech community displays either structural uniformity or increasing divergence, & Allen Grimshaw—Comment—suggests further elaboration of several points in the paper. SOCIAL PSYCHOLOGY - contains David R. Heise—Modeling Symbolic Interaction—develops an affect control model of social relations based on symbolic interactionism & the premise that social events are constructed to confirm the meanings of social classifications, & Fred L. Strodtbeck—Comment—points to retrieval under constraint as the dynamic element in the affect control model. SOCIAL MOVEMENTS - contains Mancur Olson—A Theory of Social Movements, Social Classes, and Castes—describes a theory of social groups & forms of social action derived from testable features of individual behavior, & specifically develops an explanation of the exclusivity of social groups, illustrating it with several historical examples, & Michael Hechter—Comment—raises the issue of how rational choice theory & sociology can deal with the maximization of collective good. CLOSING ADDRESS - contains James S. Coleman—Micro Foundations and Macrosocial Theory—examines various ways in which sociological observation & explanation move between the macro & micro levels, discusses the approach taken in each of the conference papers, & argues that social theory should describe the behavior of social units, but should be grounded in the behavior of individuals, the central theoretical challenge being to show how individual actions combine to produce a social outcome. Contributors to the discussions, in addition to the various authors, include Jack Goldstone, Robert K. Merton, Mary Douglas, David Rubenstein, Donald Levine, Victor Vanberg, Paul Hirsch, & Terry Clark. 7 Tables, 16 Figures, 386 References.

Cloth,$28.50.

* This book attempts to provide a systematic conceptual framework for social work practice applicable to all ethnic minority communities, focusing on universal principles of situational predicament, value beliefs, & practice protocols. Attention is called to the disjunction between social work practice emphases & ethnic minority characteristics, & it is argued that the social work profession should reexamine its theoretical orientation from the viewpoint of ethnic minorities. The framework is based on social work minority knowledge theory & consists of practice process stages, client & worker systems practice issues, & worker-client tasks. Case study illustrations are provided for process stages. The work contains 9 Chpts with Author's Preface & a Foreword by Kenji Murase (1) Ethnic Minority Perspectives on Social Work Practice: The Field of Minority Practice, The Purpose of Minority Social Work, & The Roots of Minority Social Work (2) Ethnic Minority Values and Knowledge Base: Value Criteria, Ethnic Minority Values, Social Work Knowledge Theory, & Issues in Minority Knowledge Theory (3) A Framework for Social Practice with People of Color: Existing Framework for Minority Social Work, & Frameworks for Ethnic Minority Social Work Practice (4) Contact Client System Practice Issues, & Worker System Practice Issues (5) Problem Identification, Client System Practice Issues, & Worker System Practice Issues (6) Assessment Client System Practice Issues, & Worker System Practice Issues (7) Intervention, Client and Worker Systems Practice Issues (8) Termination Client and Worker Systems Practice Issues & (9) Epilogue Competency-Based Minority Social Work Practice, & New Horizons and Challenges for Minority Social Work Practice 7 Tables, 11 Figures, 305 References.

Cloth,$35.00.

¶ This book examines Stanley Milgram's obedience experiments of 1960-1963 & assesses the widespread reaction to them within & without the social sciences, in 8 Chpts with author's Preface (1) Introduction to Milgram's Research on Obedience describes in detail the initial 1963 paper & the experiment it reports ("Behavioral Study of Obedience," Journal of Abnormal & Social Psychology, 1963, 67, 371-378), & discusses the historical & personal background of the experiments. (2) Intuitive Accounts of Obedience The Role of Beliefs and Expectations—reviews experiments in obedience prediction, showing that Ss often significantly underestimate their own & others' obedience, & suggests this is due to the normal tendency to emphasize character over situational forces. (3) The Obedience Experiments: Theme and Variations—discusses the 17 additional experiments conducted by Milgram, each varying the conditions of the original (4) Extensions and Replications in Other Laboratories—reviews various studies that establish the reliability of the obedience phenomenon & the replicability of Milgram's central findings (5) What Price Knowledge? The Ethics of the Obedience Experiments—examines the ethical controversy, initiated by Diana Baumrind's 1964 criticism of Milgram's experiments ("Some Thoughts on Ethics of Research. After Reading Milgram's 'Behavioral Study of Obedience,'" American Psychologist, 1964, 19, 421-423), over the issues of informed consent, harmful after-effects on self-esteem, & trust & deceit, then summarizes several contributions to the ethics of psychological experimentation, & concludes that the obedience experiments are justifiable (6) Criticisms of Method and Alternatives to Deception in the Study of Obedience—investigates the methodological controversy over whether Milgram's paradigm successfully operationalized the concept of harmful obedience, with emphasis on the criticisms of Martin T. Orne & Charles H. Holland about the special role of the S in an experimental situation ("On the Ecological Validity of Laboratory Deceptions," International Journal of Psychiatry, 1968, 6, 282-293). The potential use of role-playing as a substitute for deception is also discussed. The methodological validity of Milgram's paradigm is affirmed. (7) Genocide from the Perspective of the Obedience Experiments—looks at the ways in which Milgram's research has been linked to the Holocaust & reviews arguments for & against generalizing from the obedience experiments to the Holocaust & other political & historical events. (8) Milgram's Theory of Obedience An Appraisal—discusses Milgram's book Obedience to Authority: An Experimental View (New York: Harper & Row, 1974), examines additional empirical evidence for his theory of obedience, & reviews critical appraisals & endorsements of the theory. It is concluded that the theoretical model is coherent & plausible, but it is not easily susceptible to empirical verification. Epilogue—reflects on the reasons for the dramatic impact on Milgram's research & the implications for our thinking about obedience, the possibility of disobedience, & authority 4 Tables, 7 Figures, 264 References.

GENERAL STRIKES - contains (3) The New Left in France May 1968 describes the political, economic, & cultural contexts as well as the specific characteristics of the general strike by students & workers, & considers some implications, & (4) The New Left in the United States May 1970 reviews the wave of student strikes following the invasion of Cambodia, examines the integration of minority & antiwar forces into the New Left, considers the military, cultural, & political dimensions of the ensuing crisis, & discusses the flexibility of the ruling powers in responding to the crisis, drawing parallels between the Watergate & Iran-contra scandals. PART III - INTERPRETING THE NEW LEFT - includes (5) The Political Legacy of the New Left examines the principal causes for the fragmentation of the New Left, emphasizing co-optation by the two-party system, professionalization of the movement, & its displacement to the realm of culture, & (6) The Rationality of the New Left discusses the growing opposition of humanistic to scientific theory, & criticizes Soviet Marxism, traditional sociology, & systems analysis for their inability to theoretically comprehend the emergence of new social & political forms of life in the midst of crises. Appendix Documents provides documents that illustrate or support arguments presented in the book. (Cloth,$9p)

¶ An exploration of the conflict in Northern Ireland in both its current & historical contexts, which seeks alternatives to such violence in social resources, based on observational & interview data collected during 10 field trips conducted since 1955, available documentary materials, & previously published articles that have been substantially updated, amplified, & rewritten, in 10 Chpts with the author's Preface & Introduction. (1) Interethnic Conflict in the British Isles traces the current situation in Northern Ireland to interethnic & interracial relations that have existed in the British Isles since ancient tribal times. It is shown how many British groups particularly the Ucs. have used geneticist & racist rationalizations to justify SC & ethnic differences & exert political, religious, & SE control over their subject classes & colonial peoples. Efforts by the government to cope with interethnic conflicts are described, largely cosmetic steps toward granting rights to minorities, exclusion or deportation of undesirables, & continued use of force to restore law & order. Relations among the social constructs of ethnicity, SS & SC, mythical ties of nationality, & political formations are explored as they affect interethnic competition & conflict. (2) The Stuff of History. (3) Human Rights in the Orange Statelet. (4) Revolt Renewed. (5) Learning to Be Violent. (6) Terror in Upper-Class Strategy. (7) Terror in Middle- and Lower-Class Strategies. (8) Terror as Theater. (9) Quests for Peace. & (10) Is There No End to It All? summarizes various models used to explain the Northern Ireland conflict, & concludes that each taken separately distorts the complex realities of the situation. Analysis of ongoing sociohistorical processes reveals the bases on which rebellion has occurred. The utility of preventive therapy & crisis therapy in preventing conflicts from escalating into terrorist acts is doubted, since they generally focus on symptoms rather than causes. Encouragement is found in the fact that more educated & professional people are joining the ranks of both the Irish Green & Orange, hopefully, this will contribute to a growing social consciousness & a movement toward nonviolent organizing that will be more capable of attracting popular attention & support for its efforts to reorganize society. ¶ A collection of papers presented at the W. I. Thomas & Florian Znaniecki Memorial Conference on Social Theory (U of Chicago, Nov 1983), 20 papers, with 12 Comments, are grouped into XV PARTS, each of which concludes with a panel discussion in which the ideas of the papers are criticized & elaborated. PRELIMINARIES - includes Siegwart Lindenberg, James S. Coleman, & Stefan Nowak. Introduction explains that the conference, which was to have included 14 Polish social scientists, was intended to address the vacuum in sociological theory, the fragmentation of the discipline, the attention to peripheral at the expense of core issues, & the avoidance of confrontation of different theoretical approaches over the central substance of the discipline. The different methods & assumptions of various papers are compared. On W. I. Thomas and Florian Znaniecki, James S. Coleman - Opening of the Conference & Robert McCormick Adams Prologue reflects on the need to transcend disciplinary boundaries in order to understand the indeterminate human subject in social action. CURRENT ISSUES IN SOCIAL THEORY - includes Siegwart Lindenberg. How Sociological Theory Lost Its Central Issue and What Can Be Done about It argues that sociology's lack of a basis in a theory of action has led inevitably to a widening split between theory & empirical research & increasing competition from other disciplines, & that only the creation of such a basis will keep sociology from being absorbed by other social sciences. Such a theory would take as its central issues the relations between utility & morality on the one hand, & choice & structural imposition, on the other. Morris Janowitz. The Analysis of Diversity and the Diversity of Analysis raises questions about the economic rationality approach of the "new political economy," & calls attention to the distinction that Lindenberg draws between European & U.S. sociology, & Immanuel Wallerstein. The Hidden Issues: A New Agenda discusses the consensus that has reigned since the French Revolution, & which is now undergoing radical change, on five assumptions: human progress is inevitable, the basic categories of social analysis are state & society, science of the social world is analogous to that of the natural world, the two fundamental social categories of the modern world are bourgeoisie & proletariat, & Eurocentrism. THE EMERGENCE OF SOCIOLOGY AS A DISCIPLINE - includes Randall Collins. Three Sociological Traditions: On Creating the Future while Creating the Past surveys the three traditions that have emerged as basic to modern sociology: (1) that of Karl Marx & Max Weber, with its strengths in theories of stratification, conflict, & historical change; (2) that of Emile Durkheim, with its strength in a theory of the production of social solidarity by social interaction, & (3) that of microinteractionism, with its emphasis on the social psychology of everyday life. Arthur I. Stinchcombe. The Development of Scholasticism argues that is sociology develops as a discipline, it deals less with human beings, & describes how empirical intrusion into this scholasticism takes place, & Edward Shils. Two Traditions: Substantive Analysis and Empirical Research claims that there are only two basic traditions in sociology: substantive analysis & empirical research, & mentions those who have combined both, especially Durkheim. SOCIOLOGY OF KNOWLEDGE - contains Joseph Ben-David. Academic Market, Ideology, and the Growth of Scientific Knowledge. Physiology in Mid-Nineteenth-Century Germany argues against the application of SoK to scientific disciplines, & shows how a particular historical development in science can be given different sociological interpretations without implying a relativistic epistemology, & Randall Collins. Comment disagrees with the claim that science should be exempt from SoK, arguing that science is distinct from other social activities in that it is a highly nested set of networks, & should be studied as neither pure ideas nor simply social structure. NETWORK THEORY - includes Edward O. Laumann & David Knoke. Social Network Theory explains the principles of social structural analysis & gives an empirical illustration using national health policy to show the different ways in which issues are linked through social structure & how organization interest similarities correspond to their communication linkages, & Ronald S. Burt. Comment points out the weaknesses inherent in network theory when it is based on ambiguous relations & the unreliability of the empirical data, which are most important for network theory. STRUCTURAL THEORY - contains Anthony Oberschall. The California Gold Rush: Social Structure and Transaction Costs examines the development of property rights & governance institutions among gold rush miners as an illustration of how social structures can be accounted for by means of the need to minimize transaction costs & Peter M. Blau. Comment argues that the external restraints limiting rational choice, which are explained by transaction costs, are not the primary constraints on social life, & that the rational choice model does not take into account the structure of opportunities that limits the influences of individual preferences. PURPOSIVE ACTION THEORY - includes Gary S. Becker & Nigel Tones. Human Capital and the Rise and Fall of Families develops a formal model of the transmission of earnings & assets from parents to children, with the degree of intergenerational mobility determined by the interaction of utility-maximizing behavior by the parents with investment & consumption opportunities, including luck, & Russell Hardin. Comment takes issue with the assumption that the number of children in each generation equals the number of parents. ECOLOGICAL THEORY - contains Michael T. Hannan & John sight: Reshaping Authority, (12) Life on the Ward; (13) The New-Model Hospital and Its Critics; & (14) Conclusion: The Past in the Present. The consequences of its historical conditions of development for the modern hospital system are discussed. The hospital is analyzed as a social institution, & the distinctive characteristics of the US medical profession, as exemplified in the hospital system, are related to broader aspects of society & culture. 16 Illustrations.

(19) Jay A. Sigler: United States. (20) Lutz Holzner: West Germany. Appendix: Racial/Ethnic Divisions. This work seeks to demonstrate the global nature & universality of race relations problems & their social & political significance. Emphasis is not on causation or prescription, but on description of a topic that has been treated somewhat gingerly by the academic community. It is shown how the concept of race—however it is defined within the context of a particular society—is important to that society's members, even though the issue of race relations may be a taboo subject. The relevance of race & race relations is discussed from a perspective that subsumes race into ethnicity rather than into SC. Race, however, is not simply a subcategory of ethnicity; these two concepts are shown to have quite distinct meanings, which are dependent on a society's particular SE, political, cultural, & historical conditions. Though few societies admit to having racial distinctions, explaining social differences in terms of ethnicity, it is shown how even the most progressive countries have racial social arrangements, no matter how these are defined by individual governments. However, the notion of race is never strictly a matter of biology, but is determined by cultural group differences. These essays attempt to offer a comparative, culture-free analysis of race relations as distinct from other types of group social relations. It is hoped that such an approach can provide the basis for decent public policies concerning racial minority groups. 26 Tables, 603 References.

¶ A collection of 13 essays (presented in 13 Chpts) on Italian immigrants in the Ru US, which were presented at the Fourteenth Annual Conference of the American Italian Historical Assoc., St. Paul, Minn., in Oct 1981. The work is divided into III PARTS, with an Editor's Introduction, as well as notes on the authors & the conference program. PART I - MIGRATION NETWORKS AND SETTLEMENT PATTERNS - contains (1) Ryan Rudnicki: Patterns of Italian Immigrant Settlement; (2) Ernesto Milani: Marchigiani and Veneti on Sunny Side Plantation; (3) Valentine J. Belfiglio: Italians in Small Town and Rural Texas; (4) John Potesio: Itinerant Grimaldesi Paesani on the Railways; & (5) John Zucchi: Immigrant Friulani in North America. PART II - SMALL TOWN LITTLE ITALIES - includes (6) Carla Bianco: Italian Folk Culture Transplanted: Methods of Documentation; (7) Paola A. Sensi-Isolani: Tradition and Transition in a California Paese; (8) John Andreozzi: Italian Farmers in Cumberland; (9) Jacqueline Rocchio Moran: Little Italy: A Casualty of Time in Duluth; & (10) Antonio Pucci: Two Little Italies at the Head of the Lakes. PART III - MINING TOWNS - contains (11) Phyllis Cancilla Martinelli: Pioneer Paesani in Globe, Arizona; (12) Paul A. Sturgul: Italians on the Gogebic Iron Range; & (13) Rudolph J. Vecoli: Italians on Minnesota's Iron Range. To lead off, Ryan Rudnicki examines the evolution of Italian immigrant populations in 11 agricultural & mining settlements of the northeastern & north-central US; other essays use case studies & family histories to illustrate aspects of immigration patterns, eg, step migration. Focus then shifts to specific immigrant colonies, followed by detailed descriptions of three mining communities (in Ariz, Wisc, & Minn) that attracted many Italian immigrants. 2 Tables, 2 Figures, 10 Photographs.

Cloth, $59.00.

¶ A biography of Frederic Harrison, culled from his published works & thousands of manuscript letters, in 10 Chpts. (1) The Early Years: 1831-1855. (2) Neo-Positivism: 1855-1861. (3) Alliances with the Working Class: 1861-1870. (4) Shaping a Positivist Polity: 1870-1880. (5) Shaping a Positivist Religion: 1875-1901. (6) Positivism, Politics, and Philosophy: 1880-1901. (7) The Edwardian Positivist: 1901-1914. (8) The Positivist as Man of Letters: 1870-1914. (9) The Positivist as Historian: 1880-1914. (10) The Positivist as Prophet: 1914-1923. During his education at Oxford U, Harrison was influenced by the doctrines of philosopher Auguste Comte, & embarked on a lifelong commitment to positivism as the answer to social problems. Harrison's criticisms of the Established Church & endorsement of Comte's Religion of Humanity are explored, along with the ways that he applied Positivism to educational, political, & religious goals. The concept of vocation in Harrison's life is explored as a calling, an ideal of work that allows the expression of talent & personality, a social role & SS, & a source of livelihood. His work as a barrister, professor of jurisprudence, trade union activist, political radical, historian, & literary critic is chronicled. Previous neglect of Harrison's accomplishments is attributed to the fact that he outlived his contemporaries & the issues & hopes that had motivated his life, becoming a prophet of what had been reduced to "an irrelevant philosophy & a failed religion" in the face of growing reaction to Victorianism.

Cloth, $45.00 Paper, $12.95

¶ In this "sequel" to Makers of Modern Strategy (Princeton U Press, 1943) 3 of the original essays have been retained, 4 revised or rewritten, & 22 new ones added. Critical examinations of the most prominent modern military strategists are combined with analyses of particular periods & trends in 5 PARTS, with 28 Chpts, with an Introduction by the editor. Extensive bibliographical notes are provided for each Chpt. PART I - THE ORIGINS OF MODERN WAR - includes (1) Felix Gilbert Machiavelli. The Renaissance of the Art of War, (2) Gunther F. Rothenberg Maurice of Nassau, Gustavus Adolphus, Raimondo Montecuccoli, and the "Military Revolution" of the Seventeenth Century, (3) Henry Guerlac Vauban. The Impact of Science on War - focuses on a pioneer in the development of fortification strategy; & (4) R. R. Palmer Frederick the Great, Guibert, Bulow. From Dynastic to National War. PART II - THE EXPANSION OF WAR - contains (5) Peter Paret Napoleon and the Revolution in War suggests that Napoleon's spectacular but temporary successes may have led to an overestimation of his long-term contribution to strategy, (6) John Shy Jomini, & (7) Peter Paret Clausewitz considers Carl von Clausewitz to be the first objective military theorist, but questions whether his influence was as great as is popularly believed, & attempts to clarify some misconceptions of his theories. PART III - FROM THE INDUSTRIAL REVOLUTION TO THE FIRST WORLD WAR - includes (8) Edward Mead Earle. Adam Smith, Alexander Hamilton, Friedrich List. The Economic Foundations of Military Power depicts the growth of the perception of trade, industry, & communications as support for & object of protection by the military, (9) Sigmund Neumann & Mark von Hagen Engels and Marx on Revolution, War, and the Army in Society focuses on the insights of Friedrich Engels with regard to changing strategic trends, (10) Hajo Holborn The Prusso-German School: Moltke and the Rise of the General Staff; (11) Gunther F. Rothenberg Moltke, Schlieffen, and the Doctrine of Strategic Envelopment, (12) Gordon A. Craig-Delbruck: The Military Historian examines the theories of Hans Delbruck, founder of scientific military history, & his role as analyst in WWI, (13) Walter Pincus Russian Military Thought The Western Model and the Shadow of Suvorov describes the nineteenth-century search for a "Russian art of war" & the origins of Russian strategy in WWI; (14) Douglas Porch Bugeaud, Gallieni, Lyautey. The Development of French Colonial Warfare-analyzes the failure of French military policy in Indochina & Africa; (15) Russell F. Weigley-American Strategy from Its Beginnings through the First World War-focuses on the American Revolution, in which George Washington closely followed the European model of fighting, & the Civil War, which, being the first war where both sides possessed modern rifles, marked a strategic watershed. Prominent theorists at the US Military Academy are discussed, & (16) Philip A. Crowl Alfred Thayer Mahan: The Naval Historian. PART IV - FROM THE FIRST TO THE SECOND WORLD WAR - contains (17) Gordon A. Craig-The Political Leader as Strategist analyzes the consequences of the control of military strategy action by the heads of state of GB, France, Germany, & the US during WWI & WWII; (18) Michael Howard Men against Fire. The Doctrine of the Offensive in 1914-examines the reasons for the general strategic failure of WWI, where outmoded offensive strategy, combined with new weapons technology, produced catastrophic losses, (19) Michael Geyer-German Strategy in the Age of Machine Warfare, 1914-1945; (20) Brian Bond & Martin Alexander-Liddell Hart and De Gaulle. The Doctrines of Limited Liability and Mobile Defense, (21) David MacIsaac-Voices from the Central Blue: The Air Power Theorists; (22) Condoleezza Rice-The Making of Soviet Strategy-emphasizes the role of Joseph Stalin & his untimely purges of military leadership; (23) Maurice Matloff-Allied Strategy in Europe, 1939-1945-focuses on the difficulty of coordinating the aims & interests of the US, GB, & the USSR, & the strategic consequences; & (24) D. Clayton James-American and Japanese Strategies in the Pacific War. PART V - SINCE 1945 - includes (25) Lawrence Freedman-The First Two Generations of Nuclear Strategists-surveys the development of US nuclear strategy from WWII to the present, (26) Michael Carver-Conventional Warfare in the Nuclear Age-discusses the role played by conventional warfare in US & Soviet strategy since WWII, & reviews strategies employed in conflicts in the Middle East, India, & the Falklands/Malvinas war; (27) John Shy & Thomas W. Collier-Revolutionary War-emphasizes the role of Mao Tse-tung in developing modern insurgent strategy; & (28) Gordon A. Craig & Felix Gilbert-Reflections on Strategy in the Present and Future-argues that nuclear forces based on hairtrigger methodologies of implementation do not render useless the study of past strategic problems, especially regarding the importance of making military power subservient to political control. Bibliographic notes are provided for each Chpt.

Reeve, Andrew (Ed) (U Warwick, Coventry CV4 7AL England), MODERN THEORIES OF EXPLOITATION, 211 pp. Cl. London, England Sage Publications Ltd., LC 87-060206, ISBN 0-8039-8072-8.

Cloth, $39.95. Paper, $17.95

¶ This collection of revised versions of essays originally written for the European Consortium of Political Research's Joint Sessions in Barcelona, Spain, in 1985, Vol 14 in the SAGE Studies in Modern Politics series, explores the notion of "exploitation" as a critical category in modern social theory. Presented in 9 Chpts, with an Introduction by the editor, it deals with such issues as whether exploitation is a normative or a critical concept, whether it is concerned strictly with economics, particularly with labor markets, & how to characterize a nonexploitative society. (1) John D. Brewer-The Scottish Enlightenment-argues that, although key Scottish writers of the Enlightenment period (eg. Adam Smith, Adam Ferguson, John Millar, David Hume, Francis Hutcheson, Thomas Reid, & William Robertson) never used the term, their development of the labor theory of value & the relation between exploitation & alienation reveals a concern about exploitation. (2) Andrew Reeve-Thomas Hodgskin and John Bray Free Exchange and Equal Exchange-explores the idea of exploitation as it appears in two "Ricardian socialists," arguing that Thomas Hodgskin's concept presumed the worker's right to his full product, while John Bray's was based on a labor theory of value, so that they advocated free exchange & equal exchange, respectively. (3) John Cunliffe-A Mutualist Theory of Exploitation-examines the theories of Cesar de Paepe, whose desire to reconcile a liberal concern with individual property acquired by labor with a socialist concern with equality of conditions led him to embrace equal access to means of production & to reject distribution according to need. (4) Terrell Carver-Marx's Political Theory of Exploitation argues that for Karl Marx, exploitation was a necessary consequence of the ownership of means of production by one part of society, taking issue with John E. Roemer's interpretation. (5) Robert J. van der Veen Can Socialism be Non-Exploitative?-attempts to solve the problem of how Marxism can simultaneously use a nonnormative concept of exploitation & condemn capitalism as exploitative, by showing that Marxian exploitation implies that capitalism must be, but socialism need not be, exploitative. (6) Philippe Van Parijs-Exploitation and the Libertarian Challenge-considers ways of conceiving exploitation such that it is intrinsic to capitalism but not to socialism, so that the concept can serve to characterize the ethical superiority of socialism, & concludes that the only way of doing so is akin to libertarianism. (7) Hillel Steiner-Exploitation A Liberal Theory Amended, Defended and Extended-argues for a liberal model of exploitation based on property-rights violations, but concludes that the laissez-faire conditions of classical liberalism are insufficient to preclude exploitation. (8) David Miller-Exploitation in the Market-examines ways in which exploitation can occur in market economies & argues against a simple association of the two. (9) Robert E. Goodin-Exploiting a Situation and Exploiting a Person-argues against restricting exploitation to economic cases, maintaining that exploitation is fundamentally the violation of the duty to protect the vulnerable. 1 Figure, 324 References.

Adams, David S. (Dept Sociology Ohio State U, Lima 45804), Voluntarism and Civil Religion: Contributions of Presidents Lyndon Johnson and Richard Nixon.

* In his 1967 essay (no publication information given), Robert Bellah found the principal themes of a transcendent secular religion in the major public addresses of presidents of the US. Here, the contributions of two recent presidents, Lyndon Johnson & Richard Nixon, to the voluntarism theme in US civil religion are examined. According to this theme, Americans have a God-given responsibility to participate voluntarily in the betterment of their communities & nation. The Johnson & Nixon statements on voluntarism are related to similar themes identified in previous research on other twentieth-century presidents. How this civil-religion approach to US voluntarism contributes to a cultural analysis of voluntarism is described.

Babiuch, William Michael (U Toledo, OH 43606), The Effects of Social Support upon the Mental Health of Children 3-6 Years Old.

* An investigation of the effects of social support on the mental health of children aged 3-6 (N not given), independent of any stress measurements. Arguments focusing on the buffering effect of social support are presented, as well as the importance of social childcare in a society where two working parents has become the norm. A social support index (SSINDEX) by mental health (pathology) crosstabulation was run to determine the significance & direction of the relationships. Findings did not indicate a direct relationship between social support & mental health, however, the need for parental presence & interaction with the child was clearly found. Evidence is presented indicating various differences according to sex & also indicating the presence of sex-role conflicts. Suggestions are made regarding further investigation.

Ballweg, John A. & Pagtolun-an, Imelda G. (Virginia Polytechnic Instit & State U, Blacksburg 24061), Multiple Interventions: Testing the Integration Hypothesis.

* A report on a field project in Ru areas of the Dominican Republic designed to test the extent to which nutrition & public health interventions might influence family planning acceptance. The project involved household delivery of contraceptives & a research design in which various combinations of services were provided to different Ru areas. Findings failed to support the expectation that improved family planning acceptance would be associated with integrated interventions. While family planning acceptance increased, the increase was not statistically significant. At the same time, significant improvements in maternal & maternal health & illness among children were reported. However, the pattern of health improvement did not suggest that the integrated project produced the changes.

Barresi, Charles M. & Menon, Geeta (Dept Sociology U Akron, OH 44325), Patterns of Black Family Caregiving.

* A review of the current literature on family caregiving patterns involving elderly black Americans from three broad theoretical perspectives: family type, SE factors, & cultural factors. Gender, region, health status, marital status, presence of children, & residential proximity of informal supports all contribute to variations in caregiving patterns, as do the needs of the elderly, & the capacity of caregivers to provide care. The major source of care for elderly blacks is their informal support groups. Instrumental assistance is provided by kin members & expressive support by nonkin networks. A majority of elderly blacks express relatively high levels of satisfaction with the care they receive.

¶ Existing research documents the importance of both elder impairment & social support as predictors of the level of strain experienced by family members caring for community residing aged. Here, the logic of the general stressor-support-distress framework is applied to the substantive case of family caregiving in order to simultaneously examine the effects of elder impairment & instrumental support with the elder's care on caregiver strain. Specifically tested are an additive hypothesis & an interactive buffering one, using 1984 & 1985 waves of panel data from a longitudinal interview study of family caregivers (N= 87). Results indicate that greater instrumental support interacts with cognitive impairment to buffer its potentially negative effects on the kin caregiver. Unexpectedly, however, greater instrumental support exacerbates the effects of functional impairment on caregiver strain. The implications of these divergent findings for interventions with caregivers are discussed.

Bogg, Richard A. & Sanders, Janet M. (Dept Sociology Ball St. U, Muncie IN 47306), Public Drinking and Partying in Middletown: A Comparison of Adult and Adolescent Drinking Styles.

¶ McClelland & his co-workers (no reference provided) suggest that & F drinkers experience power & femininity euphorias, respectively. Preliminary observations of public drinking in Middletown (Muncie Ind) suggest a wider range of drinking euphorias, dramaturgical in nature, & readily familiar to drinkers, eg, the "great philosopher," the "Don Juan," the "femme fatale," etc. These drinking roles allow participants to be what they want to be for limited periods of time & at some risk & are pleasurable because sober social interaction is often boring if not actually damaging to self-esteem. Initial typologies were presented to 50 experienced bar & school dormitory drinkers, with a total of typologies developed. Drinking styles of adults over the course of an evening tend to become egocentric & existentially satisfying, each bar becoming a miniature "Fantasy Island" (as in the TV show by that name). Adolescent drinking styles tend to fit the "party animal" mode, the euphoria apparently stemming from self-perceptions as valued colleagues of groups whose celebrations are similarly seen as important. Wild party animals are a subgroup taken to pranks, risk-taking, & drinking to the point of vomiting & passing out. While violence & accidental death are tragic consequences of party animal behavior, nearly all collegians gradually outgrow it, becoming for a time, at least, social drinkers.

Bonomo, Thomas Anthony (Dept Sociology & Social Welfare Bloomsburg U, PA 17815), Origins and Characteristics of the New Right: The Potential Threat.

¶ A comprehensive analysis & critique of traditional literature & current works on the political Right & fascism. Core conceptual components of this seemingly diverse political, economic, & cultural phenomenon are presented. Views expressed by authors such as De Felice who conclude that fascism is unique to a particular historical & cultural period are rejected. A more general conceptual scheme is developed based on the writings of Oliver C. Cox & others. The essence of fascism is contained within its attempt to provide for the ascendancy of elites while simultaneously casting whole sectors of society into subservient minority categories which become available as a source of inexpensive labor. Fascism attempts to accomplish the above agenda through its programs based in racial & religious exclusivity, heightened nationalism, etc. This working definition is then applied to active New Right organizations, & numerous similarities are demonstrated.

INTRODUCTION

This Supplement is presented to all registrants of the 1988 North Central Sociological Association meeting with the compliments of the Association and the cooperation of SA.

The numbering of the abstracts has been integrated into a continuous Supplement acquisitions number series begun in 1973. For example, the first abstract, that of a paper by Adams, David S., is numbered: S20058 / NCSA / 1988 / 1310. S20058 is the first number following the last Supplement, No. 148, and the letter S stands for Supplement. After this number is the acronym NCSA, followed by the year, and the last number indicates that this is the 1310th abstract that SA has published from NCSA meetings to date.

The abstracts from this Supplement are fully indexed and the index entries appear in the SA issue of which this Supplement is a part - SA, 1988, 36, 1, April.

Notice

Abstracts of papers that reached the SA editorial offices after the deadline will appear in the December 1988 issue (SA Vol. 36, Issue 5). Falgiani, A. Anthony & Bankosh, John J., Jr. (State U New York Coll, Fredonia 14063). Whither Social Accounting: A Sociology of Knowledge Perspective of the Rise and Fall of Accounting for Social Performance.

* Tracing the literature in the field of social accounting from the 1970s through the 1980s, it is shown that while writing in the area of the social performance of business proliferated in the previous decade, its relative scarcity is obvious in the latter half of the 1980s. An analysis of the literature reveals the reasons for the shifting interest of business & accounting authors. SoftK concepts are applied to show that the diminution of concern with the field of social accounting is a result of the change in social focus during the period studied.

Fararo, Thomas J. (Dept Sociology U Pittsburgh, PA 15260). Unification of Sociological Theory.

* A vision of sociological theory that might serve both as an idealized model & as a stimulus to its further advancement is proposed. The image of a single comprehensive research tradition with plural communicating & sometimes conflicting subtraditions is suggested, with a process world view providing a superordinate metaphysical & epistemological basis. Work on developing philosophical models of theory structure & theoretical explanation that subordinate postpositivist conceptions is also useful. Formalization & unification processes also play a vital role. Plural frameworks & theories are not incompatible with episodes of integration, either at the level of theoretical procedure or at the level of actual unification of theories as such, both of which are illustrated from published work.

Farley, John E. (Southern Illinois U, Edwardsville 62026-1455). Visual Urban Sociology: Using Video Technology to Teach about the City.

* The use of a video camera to display to students the social characteristics of city neighborhoods is demonstrated. Among the neighborhoods considered are stable ethnic neighborhoods, neighborhoods experiencing gentrification, neighborhoods characterized by poverty & abandonment, areas undergoing planned redevelopment by private developers, & "Gold Coast & Slum" areas where affluence & gentrification exist side-by-side with poverty & abandonment. Here, focus is on the city of St. Louis, Mo, though similar material could be prepared for an Ur sociology class in virtually any medium to large metropolitan area. Video technology allows students to directly see evidence of social processes & patterns, & can be related to other sources of data & information; in this case, it is related to the findings of a factorial ecology study of St. Louis.

Fasick, Frank A. (Dept Sociology U Waterloo, Ontario N2L 3G1). The Changing Meaning of High School in the Lives of Adolescents.

* The social meaning of high school graduation has been changing over the last century. As greater numbers of young persons complete high school, the experience has become more like the rites of passage described by van Gennep (Les Rites de Passage, 1908). He proposed that these rites involve patterns of segregation, transition, & incorporation. Modern adolescents are segregated in high schools where they are formally socialized for the responsibilities of adult life (ie, transition). The high school graduation ceremony ritually marks the incorporation of the graduate into young adulthood. The near universal graduation from high school in the Mc & much of the We means that high school assumes the characteristics of age-grade rites of passage throughout most of society.

Feinberg, William E. (Dept Sociology U Cincinnati, OH 45221-0378). Computer Simulation Modeling: Problems, Pitfalls, and Opportunities.

* In the early 1960s computer simulation & mathematical modeling were held out by many prominent sociologists as the avenue by which sociology would achieve scientific status. Here, some of the problems that have interfered with computer simulation modeling becoming a more prominent tool for theory-building analysis among sociologists are discussed. These problems include the difficulties or routinizing the use of simulation, the unreasonable expectations for verisimilitude placed on simulation models, & rejection of the scientific model for sociology. How responses to these problems can provide both pitfalls & opportunities for the social scientific researcher-theorist are addressed, arguing that computer simulation modeling is still a viable & useful approach to many sociological questions concerning theory building, theory testing, & analysis.

Ferraro, F. Kenneth, Dixon, Richard, Levy, Diane & Lowery, Roger (Dept Sociology Northern Illinois U, DeKalb 60115). The Legal Control of Public Smoking: Examining Support for Proscriptive Norms.

● Complete paper available from SA Reproduction Service prepaid at $0.25 per page plus $1.50 search & postage. Length of paper: 26 pp.
 ¶ The increasing tendency to prohibit smoking in public places is examined as a challenge to the smoking lifestyle. Drawing from Max Weber's analysis of status honor & the health belief model, the development of proscriptive norms for public smoking in Ill & NC is investigated via 1985/86 survey data (Σ N = 944). While smoking prevalence is similar in both states, Ill residents are more likely to consider smoking harmful & to favor legal controls. Support to legally control public smoking appears to be more than just an expression of nonsmokers' concern for clean air; it is also one way to delegitimize the smoking lifestyle.

Fischer, Henry W., III & Bischoff, Beth (Dept Sociology Mount Union Coll, Alliance OH 44601). Man-Made Disasters: As Portrayed by the National Print Media, 1945-1985.

● Complete paper available from SA Reproduction Service prepaid at $0.25 per page plus $1.50 search & postage. Length of paper: 38 pp.
 ¶ An assessment of the validity of the assumption among disaster researchers that the community breakdown model (portraying behavioral response to disasters as irrational) is perpetuated by the print media. A content analysis was conducted of 38 man-made disaster news stories which appeared in a US news magazine between 1945 & 1985, employing chi-square analysis to determine the extent to which the breakdown model myths appear in the news stories before vs after 1985, which myths appear most often, & the circumstances under which they appear. It was found that the breakdown model was not perpetuated by the print media for man-made or technological disasters, in contrast to earlier findings for natural disaster news stories. Characteristics of news stories that perpetuate myths are described. The incidence of accurate portrayals of behavioral response to technological disasters does not appear to mitigate against myth dissemination.

Fitzpatrick, Kevin M. & LaGory, Mark E. (Dept Sociology U Alabama, Birmingham 35294). Ecological Determinants of Mortality among Southern Real Estate Firms, 1960-1980.

● Complete paper available from SA Reproduction Service prepaid at $0.25 per page plus $1.50 search & postage. Length of paper: 37 pp.
 ¶ An analysis of the ecological determinants of real estate firm death in 25 southern US Ur areas in the 1960s & 1970s, based on telephone book listings, US census data, & county & city statistics. In both decades, organizational competition was strongly related to firm death, as was the level of demand for services, as indexed by the average number of movers. There were also important differences between the two time periods. In the 1960s, the strongest determinant of firm mortality was the amount of available savings capital in the metropolitan area. For the 1970s, a period of dramatic changes in the institutional environment, savings capital had no effect on firm death, but the supply of housing, & the degree to which local communities regulated growth through property taxes, did affect firm deaths. These findings suggest that as the institutional environment changes, local ecology becomes more critical in determining the fate of firms.

Flanagan, Constance A. (Dept Behavioral Sciences U Michigan, Dearborn 48128). The Effects of Parents' Insecure Work Attachment on the Young Adolescent.

¶ An ecological model by which stressful events such as layoffs affect family dynamics & children's development is presented, based on longitudinal survey data from 700 parents & their young adolescents from 12 school districts where official unemployment statistics ranged between 7.9% & 19%. 110 of these families experienced a job loss but regained jobs during the course of the study; 440 families reported no changes in work security; & 150 lost their jobs but did not find other work. Young adolescents' perceptions of family dynamics & their own developmental adjustment were affected by changing patterns of parental work security.

22-Hour Ways of Coping Checklist-Cancer during home interviews. Using the null hypothesis, racial & sex differences were examined on 5 factors: problem-focused, wishful thinking, spiritualism, avoid others/blame self, & seek social support. Statistically significant racial differences occurred on 2 factors: blacks scored higher on wishful thinking & spiritualism. When the 886 patients diagnosed with colon or bladder cancer were analyzed for sex differences, statistically significant differences occurred on all factors: the 406 Fs scored higher on problem solving, wishful thinking, spiritualism, & avoid others/blame self, but lower on seeking social support, than the 480 Ms. When race & sex were simultaneously compared, black Fs scored highest on wishful thinking & spiritualism, & white Ms scored highest on seeking social support. When education was controlled, the joint effects of both sex & race produced statistically significant results on all the coping strategies with the exception of avoid others/blame self. These findings are consistent with previous work in demonstrating that blacks have a greater religious perspective on health than whites (Elli & Haywood, 1985/86), they do not support the results of Folkman & Lazarus (1980) who found no gender differences in problem-focused & emotion-focused coping in contexts related to health episodes.

Brooks, Dana D. & Penttila, Matti (School Physical Education West Virginia U, Morgantown 26506-6116), The Socialization of American Basketball Players in Finland.

¶ An investigation of the sociocultural problems experienced by US basketball players who were recruited to play in Finland, & the extent to which significant others influenced their decisions to join a foreign team. Questionnaire data from the 8 Americans who participated in the Finland Professional Basketball League (FPBL) during the 1986/87 season, including those who became Finnish citizens, & interview data from the FPBL director & 3 American players revealed that 5 of the players were initially contacted by an American agent, & that personal friends & agents had a significant influence on the decision to play basketball in Finland. The biggest sociocultural problems encountered by the Americans were missing their friends in the US & use of leisure time.

Campbell, James D. (Dept Family & Community Medicine U Missouri, Columbia 65212), Psychosocial Dimensions in the Delivery of Primary Care.

¶ The delivery of primary health care involves a complex interactive process between provider & patient. Delineation of the characteristic dimensions of this process is important in understanding the outcomes of the clinical encounter. With the current emphasis in primary care on treating the whole patient, the psychosocial dimension represents an important component of these encounters. As part of a national research project designed to evaluate the structure, process, & outcome of joint practice between MDs & nurse practitioners (NPs), data were collected on 92 MDs & 83 NPs from 375 clinical encounters, which were videotaped, & interviews with both provider & patient conducted after each encounter & a month later. Provider behaviors were recorded on 5 indices: affiliation, control, somatic diagnosis/treatment, provision of information, & psychosocial diagnosis/treatment. The results indicate that the psychosocial dimension of the clinical encounter was associated primarily with type of provider, type of visit, visit history, & gender of patient. Patient satisfaction was influenced more by patient perceptions than by actual events that occurred during a clinical encounter. The findings suggest that, within a framework of identical goals, there can be variations of specific objectives & areas of emphasis. Evaluation of professional performance must explore the relationship of tasks to the objectives of the provider, the orientations of all participants, & the styles of performance.

Carroll, Robert L. (Dept Sociology U Cincinnati, OH 45221), Ecological Emphases in the Study of Occupations.

¶ Various contributions that the ecological frame-of-reference can make to the general sociological study of occupations are discussed, & an attempt is made to demonstrate the fruitfulness of research on occupations for ecology itself. It is proposed that the concept of occupation is central to ecological theory definitions, & considerations of occupation that are peculiar to human ecology are discussed. A set of ecological hypotheses are derived & discussed, & data from the Dictionary of Occupations 1939-1977 are presented to illustrate particular research directions. Data from the US Dept of Labor (1960-1980) are presented in partial support of several of the hypotheses. Suggestions are offered for future research.

Clark, Paul F. (Pennsylvania State Labor Studies, 2550 7th St N, Kensington 15068), Meeting the Challenges of the Eighties: The Legacy of Democratic Reform in the UMWA.

¶ On 22 Dec 1972 Arnold Miller, candidate of the Miners' for Democracy reform movement, was sworn in as president of the United Mineworkers of America (UMWA). Ten years later, current UMWA president Richard Trumka took the same oath of office. Trumka's election was the legacy of the ten-year-old reform movement, which included many structural & procedural reforms. The following issues are examined: (1) the reforms instituted during Miller's tenure in office in the areas of bargaining, elections, & internal union administration, (2) the fate of the democratic reform movement under the Sam Church & Trumka administrations, & (3) the manner in which those reforms shaped & now limit the union's response to the challenges currently facing it.

Coreno, Thaddeus (Dept Sociology & Anthropology Kent State U, OH 44242), Trends in American Sociological Theory in the Past Decade.

¶ In a replication of a 1981 study by Richard Wells & Steven Picou (reference not provided) that analyzed the structure of theoretical & methodological components in US sociology via content analysis of articles published in the American Sociological Review (ASR) from 1936 to 1978, articles published in the ASR from 1979 to 1987 are examined seeking evidence to confirm or contradict the trends reported by Wells & Picou. Their study utilized a modified conceptualization of Thomas S. Kuhn's notion of paradigm. Since there is a lack of complete consensus concerning theory & methods in sociology, Wells & Picou searched for partial paradigmatic components that might indicate a limited but consistent agreement within the discipline concerning theory & research. Partial paradigm components include theory group, theoretic viewpoint, methodology, type of statistical analysis, image of the subject matter, & unit of analysis. Together these components provide an analytical guide to the structure of US sociology. Wells & Picou used this classification scheme for content analysis of 707 articles, & found the following dominant themes in the ASR: structural functionalism, survey & multivariate statistical techniques, an objective image of social life, & focus on individuals & roles as the unit of analysis. This replication uses the same classification scheme with some slight modifications for content analysis of 175 articles, & finds evidence supporting the trends reported by Wells & Picou. The most significant finding is the predominance of social structuralism as the theory utilized most frequently. The survey is the method used most, & multivariate techniques are the main tool for statistical analysis. Implications of these partial paradigmatic components are discussed.

Cutright, Phillips & Smith, Herbert L. (Dept Sociology Indiana U, Bloomington 47405), Intermediate Causes of Racial Differences in 1980 Illegitimacy Rates.

¶ Racial differences in 1980 US illegitimate fertility rates are, theoretically, the result of racial differences in: (1) sexual intercourse, (2) contraception, (3) abortion, & (4) legitimization of births conceived out-of-wedlock. National data for the 4 independent variables in 3 age groups (15-19, 20-24, 25-29) are discussed (N not given), & the contribution of each to the racial differences in illegitimacy rates is assessed with a formal decomposition model. The racial difference in all the predictors results in higher black than white rates in all age groups. The relative importance of each predictor varies with age.

Duquin, Mary E. (U Pittsburgh, PA 15261), Sportive Play: Pain as Discourse.

¶ The wisdom of the body may be to deny the ascetic, to cry that "no pain is sane," yet humans repeatedly subject themselves & others to the experience of pain. The meanings of sportive players' willingness to both suffer & inflict pain are examined. A cultural critique of the valorization of pain in sportive play is provided, & the relation of rationalized pain to cultural discourse & its impact on reality deconstruction & artifact creation is examined. Pain tolerance communicates meanings about the ontological status of the body. Drawing on a variety of feminist frameworks (socialist, radical, postmodern), pain's meaning is discussed in reference to identity, self-extension, objectification, & substantiation. Examination of this issue is extended by an analysis of the ideology of pain in sportive play as depicted in popular cinema.

ysis of archival data, including 95 transcripts of employee interviews conducted for a police investigation. The results support the notion, prevalent in recent disaster literature, that the social order can adapt & evolve to meet extraordinary demands. Gender roles endure & occupational roles expand to guide behavior. Enduring & emergent norms result in prosocial, adaptive behavior.

Kahn, Peggy (Dept Political Science U Michigan, Flint 48502), Yorkshire and Nottinghamshire Area Unionism and the Restructuring of the British Coalfields in the 1980s.

• The general political economic strategy of Thatcherism involves disrupting the postwar settlement in GB, substituting for its collectivist & social democratic arrangements an individualistic, reinvigorated free market capitalism. The project of the Thatcher government has involved withdrawing the state from its previous role in economic management & limiting the size of the public sector. It also involves weakening unions in the public & private sectors that might resist the restructuring efforts of British capital. The coal industry has been an important object of this strategy, both because coal is an older, nationalized industry & the issue of jobs & employment as goals of industrial & political activity. The Left wing of the union favored the year-long strike against pit closures & against the overall Coal Board strategy. The Right wing of the union, based in safer more profitable areas, argued for a conciliatory realism that accepted the Coal Board strategy. In the wake of the strike's defeat, a split in the National Union of Mineworkers (NUM) created the Union of Democratic Miners, a more managerially oriented union. A detailed analysis of the Thatcher economic policy, as typified by the national Coal Board, reveals how it contributed to the fragmentation of the NUM.

Kauffman, Donna R. (Ohio State U, Lima 45804), Resource Mobilization Theory and the New Christian Right: Centralization vs Decentralization of Movement Resources.

• Complete paper available from SA Reproduction Service prepaid at $0.25 per page plus $1.50 search & postage. Length of paper: 24 pp.
• An examination of the network structure of the New Christian Right (NCR), which challenges the notion in resource mobilization theory that a movement can be seen to be in a state of decline when the movement resources are not increasingly coming under the collective control of national-level movement organizations. The theoretical model is a synthesis of Charles Tilly's resource mobilization model (From Mobilization to Revolution, Reading, Mass. Addison-Wesley, 1978) & J. Kenneth Benson's political economy of organizations model (see SA 23 5/75116043), according to which mobilization is facilitated at the national level by an indirect network structure & at the local level by a direct network structure. In either case, it is possible for a movement to remain viable. Findings of a survey of NCR members in a small midwestern city support the hypothesis. The network structure that emerged is direct in nature. Resources have not been withdrawn from the NCR such that the movement can be said to be in a state of demobilization; they have simply been redistributed to the local level. Because the issues of primary concern are issues that the decentralized political structure has made local issues or state's rights issues, it is suggested that, rather than being in a state of demobilization, the NCR may be more effective with the resources controlled by the locals.

King, James A. (U Toledo, OH 43606), Correlates of Mental Illness among Adolescents.

• An examination of the relationship between family composition & levels of mutual pathology among adolescents. The data are derived from a self-report instrument administered to a stratified sample of 3,000 students in grades 7, 9, & 11 of both public & private school systems (N = 24) operating in 6 Ohio counties. The instrument consisted of 145 variables measuring psychiatric pathology behaviors, substance abuse levels, sociodemographic characteristics, family stability characteristics, & mental health services utilization. Analyzing the differences between family compositional & demographic characteristics & 5 mental health pathology scales, results show higher pathology levels for F adolescents. Age is also significantly related to pathology levels. Family residential changes & marital instability are also significantly related to pathology.

• An examination of one of the processes inherent in the development of youth subcultures. Data from participant observation & document analysis of a "Star Trek" fan club (otherwise known as Trekkers or the crew on the Proudstar) show how this subculture searches for its own particular style & identity. Such a search is neither static nor smooth, but rather, dynamic &, at times, chaotic. The various elements of this group's style are described & some insights provided as to why the "search for style" is an important, yet difficult, task for these Trekkers.

• Violence in sports is becoming so predominant that many spectators attend sporting events expecting to view some kind of aggressive sports acts. There is mounting evidence to suggest that rule violating behavior is being perceived as a legitimate part of the game by athletes, but only minimal research examining coaches & their perceived legitimacy of such aggressive acts. Since the coach plays a vital role in the socialization of the athlete, a study is proposed to determine to what degree intentional aggressive behavior is perceived as legitimate by coaches. Also to be examined is what effect coaching experience & competitive level have on degree of legitimization of an intentional act. An original questionnaire has been constructed to obtain demographic information as well as information pertaining to the promotion, legitimization, &/or condemnation of a continuum of intentional aggressive sports acts. It is predicted that the findings of this study will be (1) coaches will perceive intentional sports acts as a legitimate part of the game of soccer, (2) there will be a positive relationship between coaching experience & perceived legitimization of violent sports acts, & (3) there will be a positive relationship between competitive level & the promotion of aggressive acts by the coaches to their players.

Korllos, Thomas S. (Dept Sociology & Anthropology Kent State U, OH 44242), The Physical City: A Reinterpretation of Wirth's Theory.

• Two ideas are pursued with regard to Louis Wirth's theory of the city. (1) An alternative interpretation of Wirth's classic statement is considered, suggesting that he really meant physical size of the city as well as population size in his theorizing on urbanization. (2) Extending from environmental sociology more broadly, & from architectural sociology more specifically, it is suggested that disorganization & other attributes of the city may be due as much, if not more, to physical features of the city as to population characteristics, as posited by Wirth. Described are the physical features of the city contributing to the social structural conditions that impact on Ur dwellers. Of particular interest are such disorganizing effects as problems of interpersonal relations characterized by violence, competition, & conflict, problems of psychological states characterized by escape & alienation, & problems of individuals such as poor health, drug & alcohol abuse, physical malfunction, deviant behavior, & lack of self-control. The physical features of the city are thought to have two types of effects on Ur dwellers: information overload of the type suggested by Georg Simmel, & the sheer scale of buildings, streets, & blocks, which tends to produce anonymity, alienation, & estrangement. Wirth's theory of urbanization is combined with an interpretation of the effect of physical environment on social behavior, the resulting synthesis is a potentially more powerful explanation of Ur behavior.

¶ A reexamination of the sanction considered independently of its present penal & criminological connotations is proposed. Past & present efforts to develop complicated classification schemes & taxonomies are criticized. Instead, an alternative systems approach is suggested, using the algorithm as the fundamental concept. In such a model, the sanction may be seen as either exclusionary or inclusionary. Which orientation is salient is based on information the system receives & how it is interpreted. Thus, what is gained in terms of overt social control may diminish the quantity & quality of information that can be known about the object of the sanction.

¶ An examination of the origins & meaning of "fanshipe," based on interviews with serious sports fans (N = 30). Two categories of fans are described: (1) "homers," or communal fans, whose identification is with the home team, & (2) fans of out-of-town teams. Findings indicate that out-of-town fanshipe is idiosyncratic, but includes significant cases of fanshipe produced through the socialization process. Fanshipe due to overcompensation or for parental loss occurs, but not frequently, among homers more than among out-of-town fans. Communal alienation appears to play little role in the formulation of out-of-town fans. Both types appear solidly rooted in the socialization process.

¶ Much sociological research on physical & mental disability has utilized the labeling theory approach to the study of deviance, however, various authors have pointed out contradictions inherent in the use of labeling theory. Here, the positive consequences of stigma are explored with respect to two substantively different "deviant" populations: ex-psychiatric patients & involuntarily childless women. Using exploratory, qualitative approaches, descriptive data were collected through participant observation & interviews with 285 chronic & nonchronic ex-psychiatric patients & 71 involuntarily childless women. It is demonstrated empirically that a number of positive consequences can result from the possession of a stigmatizing attribute. In the case of ex-psychiatric patients: (1) it legitimizes all posthospital deviant behavior, (2) it provides ex-patients with a set of opportunities for monetary & other rewards, (3) it functions, in certain cases, to strengthen familial relationships, & (4) it provides individuals with a set of gratifications that they could not have otherwise experienced. In terms of involuntarily childless women, the possession of a stigmatizing attribute: (A) strengthens familial relationships, (B) affects, in some cases, career plans, & (C) generates certain positive experiences & gratifications that might otherwise not have been experienced. The role of informal self-help groups & deviant subcultures in generating positive responses to stigma are also discussed.

Himes, Joseph S. (U North Carolina, Greensboro 27412), Trends of Interracial Conflict and Cooperation in Urban Communities.

¶ In the last quarter of the nineteenth century, after the abolition of slavery, a rigid racial structure composed of a large, dominant white class interfacing a weak subordinate black class was established. This structure

& pattern of race relations was first openly opposed in the early twentieth century. Pressure for change has continued to the present, coming from the black community, the government, sympathetic whites, & other sources. Over time, the styles of conflict exhibited by both whites & blacks changed. The aggressiveness & dominance of whites was limited by pragmatic struggle by blacks, federal government action, & various private institutional forces. On the other hand, blacks became more assertive, rational, & effective in their struggle. It is concluded that change in interracial conflict & cooperation will continue in several ways: (1) because of recent conservative trends, the intensity of interracial conflict can be expected to increase steadily, (2) interracial conflict & cooperation are likely to become increasingly similar in all regions of the nation, (3) violent conflict of unprecedented intensity may erupt in the interracial permanent underclasses of the nation's metropolitan areas. On the other hand, it seems likely that continuing implementation of civil rights opening of the society, & spreading of social objectivity in both racial communities will increase the volume of cooperation.

¶ Some distinctive features of coal mining industrial relations in GB & the US in the 1970s & 1980s are identified, with further comparative reference to the cases of West Germany & France. Focus is on the role played by the state in attempting to regulate collective bargaining in coal mining. State intervention assumed a special character in GB, first with the nationalization of the industry shortly after WWII, & more recently with the major offensive waged by the Margaret Thatcher government in 1984/85. Various forms of state intervention in each of the four countries are discussed, & propositions concerning the breakup of industrial relations settlements or regimes are tested against the experience in coal mining in all four countries. Coal miners & their unions continue to withstand extraordinary challenges as they experience LF contraction, technological change, & predictions for the future that constantly change with new projections of domestic & global energy trends. All of these challenges provide the context for understanding changes that have occurred in the structure & the politics of miners' unions, both nationally & with modest beginnings, internationally.

experiences & activities as they occur, tend to elicit more reports of symptoms than do interviews, are better in reporting acute symptoms, & are at least as accurate in reporting chronic conditions. For older adults, whose health condition is more complex & whose recall may be inaccurate, the diary would seem especially useful; however, recent studies of elderly have reached contradictory conclusions about the relative merits of the diary as opposed to interviews. In a comparison of these two formats, 15% of a large randomly selected group of adults aged 45-94 who completed a health-related interview (N = 83) also kept a daily health diary for a month. The results indicate that more chronic conditions are reported in the interview than the diary, & the discrepancy between the formats increases with age. However, single chronic conditions are more likely to be reported in the diary, whereas multiple conditions are far less likely to be reported in that format. Implications of results for health reporting by the elderly are discussed.

Nusbaumer, Michael R. (Indiana-Purdue U, Fort Wayne 46805), Changing Images of Deviant Behavior: The Fiscal Crisis of the State and the Organizational Survival of N.I.A.A.A.

It has long been recognized that governmental organizations frequently give greater attention to organization stability & expansion than to service delivery. Yet, little attention has been given to organizations responsible for deviant management when they are faced with the fiscal crisis of the state. An analysis of the National Inst of Alcoholism & Alcohol Abuse (NIAAA) is presented to shed light on the impact of fiscal crisis on organizational activities & the resultant changes that have occurred in the images of alcohol misuse supported by this agency. Tracing the 14-year fiscal history of the NIAAA, internal allocation shifts suggest significant changes in both the conceptions of deviant drinking & appropriate forms of agency-based deviant management. Since much of the impetus for initial agency establishment was the direct result of interest groups attempting to win acceptance & recognition for the disease model of deviant alcohol consumption, an analysis of the changes in agency support for this conception of deviant drinking should prove quite fruitful. This analysis is further detailed by a content analysis of the titles of all NIAAA-funded psychosocial research grants. Implications from this analysis are discussed regarding both the changes in deviant images & organizational responses to reduced funding.

Ober, Barbara (Sociology Dept Shippensburg U, PA 17257), Unobtrusive Measures of the Amish: Aging and Death—A Preliminary Report.

The Amish & related anabaptist groups represent a "living laboratory" for the study of traditional, Ru, agrarian lifestyles. Separated from many aspects of modernization by religious philosophy, the "plain people" emphasize obedience, discipline, & simplicity expressed through family & group life. The colorfully unique result has led to invasion & exploitation by tourism & the mass media & increased efforts of the people to remain separate. Research on the Amish lifestyle presents both ethical & methodological problems. The work that has been done has been either secretive or invasive, or has relied heavily on the reports of a small handful of former Amish people who have employed sociological skills in the analysis of their former lifestyles. An unobtrusive data source for the plain people was found in a weekly newspaper, The Budget (published in Sugar Creek, Ohio); its reports of daily activities in Amish & Mennonite areas throughout the country, submitted by "scribes" in the various districts, detail the weather, births, marriages & deaths, illnesses & accidents, & other incidents. Content analysis of articles dealing with aging & death confirms that the Amish treat the elderly with respect & affection & view aging as a normal & valuable stage of life, & death as a sorrowful but natural conclusion. The gerontocracy of the Amish does not appear to produce the type of resentment usually associated with this type of social organization. The negative attitudes (gerontophobia) prevalent in the modernized society in which the Amish are embedded have not impinged on their expressed attitudes. Content analysis, although not without interpretation problems, alleviates both the ethical & methodological concerns raised by more intrusive approaches.

Support for a women's professional organization can be explored by comparing attitudes & behavior by membership status. A membership effect would reveal a scaled difference between current, former, & nonmembers, a withdrawal effect, differences between former members & all others; & an activism effect, differences between members & all others. A survey instrument mailed to all 370 women lawyers in "Capital City" brought 220 responses, including those from all 82 members of the local Women Lawyer's Assoc. A membership effect was found, with lessening of feminist & political orientations & activities (endorse women/feminists for judgeships or bar association positions) as affiliation weakened from current to former to nonmembers. Compared to others, former members were more likely to hold conservative political views, favor support groups for women lawyers, & be divorced, suggesting a crosspressure driven withdrawal effect. Members were very active, worked & earned more, belonged to other groups, & were married. Law school attended or current employer did not differ by membership.

Initially conceived of as a tool for statistical analysis & word processing, the microcomputer can be used in various ways in the laboratory or classroom, eg, replicating study results, extending findings via elaboration, exploring databases, & examining the relationship between symbolic logic & the deductive logic of theory, as well as in computer-aided instruction & computerized testing. However, issues regarding access, usage, & management arise when a school or unit acquires a microcomputer, & decisions & attendant compromises must be made concerning facilities, equipment, & software. Also to be considered are issues of computer literacy & compatibility. One approach is to teach a programming language & several popular software packages, which maximizes the generalizability of computer skills. ¶ Focusing on the educational & occupational selectivity of migrants in Ohio from 1975 to 1980, the propensity to migrate, migration stream differentials, & the impact of migration on the composition of Ohio's resident population are examined, based on data from the 1980 Public Use Micro Data Sample, File A. Migration status & distance of migration are categorized as: nonmigrant, intracounty, migrant, intercounty (intra-state) migrant, interstate-contiguous migrant, & interstate-noncontiguous migrant. Analysis reveals that Ohio's selective patterns of migration correspond to patterns observed elsewhere. High status persons, eg. Coll graduates, managers, & professionals, are more likely to migrate & to migrate further. When age is controlled for, the relationship between migration, education, & occupation not only remains, but is stronger at younger ages. In terms of gross interstate migration exchanges, relative to outmigrant flows, immigrant flows from both contiguous & noncontiguous states are not substantially different in the proportion of high status persons. Due to interstate net migration, Ohio's Coll graduate population aged 25+ declined by 6.5% between 1975 & 1980. Net migration lowered Ohio's managerial & professional population aged 16+ by 4.4%.

¶ First union dissolution is analyzed by the type of union in Guyana, Trinidad & Tobago, & Jamaica, based on World Fertility Survey data on marital histories of women ever in union which the first partnership dissolved. The analysis indicates high levels of union dissolution with probabilities within 10 years of the onset of the union equal to .31, .41, & .65 in the 3 countries. These probabilities depend basically on the type of first union: married, common law, & visiting, with the latter having the highest risk of dissolution. Sociodemographic factors associated with the risk of first union dissolution are analyzed using a proportional hazard model. The risk of first union dissolution is also dependent on covariates like age at first union, years since first union, first birth status, ethnic group, & number of children ever born. Fertility levels are associated not only with the type of first union, but also with the risk of dissolution in each type. Visiting unions have an antinatalist effect, while common law unions have a pronatalist effect.

¶ With increasing frequency, policymakers, practitioners, & social scientists have suggested either implicitly or explicitly that the experience & needs of caregivers of Alzheimer's victims be given special consideration separate from caregivers of elders with other types of impairment. Utilizing data gathered through interviews with 445 elders & their caregivers at 2 points in time, elders were categorized in 1 of 3 groups: "probable" Alzheimer's diagnosis, cognitively impaired non-Alzheimer's, & those with no cognitive impairment. Comparisons among the 3 groups were made in terms of: (1) background & demographic characteristics, (2) types & intensity of tasks performed by caregivers, (3) caregivers' attitudes toward the caregiving experience, & (4) formal service use. Controlling for background differences, the results produced no detectable difference among groups in the caregiving experience, & very few meaningful differences in formal service use. The results suggest that diagnostic groupings may not be as useful in delineating different needs & patterns of service use as other variables, rather, diagnostic groups appear to be a proxy variable for other characteristics of the caregiving situation (eg. relationship of the caregiver to the elder, marital status of the elder or living arrangement) that can be shown to exert a more direct influence on outcome variables.

An investigation of the process of conflict resolution in a residential child treatment facility. Agency staff there document the accounts offered by clients following transgressions, & add their interpretations of these accounts & offenses. Both the accounts offered by the adolescent clients & the attributions of motive made by staff were coded into a typology drawn from the deviance literature; 197 resolution documents, involving 19 clients & 25 staff, were coded. The clients were usually considered to be "emotionally troubled"; of the 197 resolutions, only 10 involved (3) F clients. Analysis shows that (1) the type of accounts offered by clients is influenced by staff expectations, past resolutions, & length of agency stay, (2) staff strategies of conflict resolution & motive attribution follow a pattern consistent with agency ideology, & (3) the negotiation of client status means that certain types of accounts are consistently rejected by staff, & others consistently accepted, showing the relationship between staff attributions & the solicitation of certain types of excuses & justifications from clients. A case-study technique is used to illustrate the process of social typing from intake to discharge at this facility, & the agency program manual, intake studies, official documents, staff interviews, & participant observation are employed to add to the case material. The qualitative methodology follows the interpretive traditions of symbolic interactionism & ethnomethodology research in the sociology of deviance. It is argued that this type of analysis of accounts & motive attribution is a particularly good way to study the social typing process.

Shupe, Anson & Hadden, Jeffrey K. (Indiana-Purdue U, Fort Wayne IN 46805), Spiritual Healing and the Medical Model.

The stubborn persistence in modern societies of healing therapies based on spiritualism & supernatural agents is a curious fact. Despite accelerated scientific advancement in the field of medicine & surgery, alternative healing cults, sects, & philosophies are enjoying something of a resurgence if not a revival in the latter part of the twentieth century. Using the theoretical framework of physics scholar Thomas S. Kuhn from the The Structure of Scientific Revolutions (1962), the gradual emergence of the medical model, or scientific biomedical paradigm, is interpreted as the result of a progressive paradigm shift. This shift can be traced from the prehistoric era to the twentieth century & represents a gradual (but certainly not unbroken or simply unilinear) separation of the understanding of health & illness from the sacred realm. According to Kuhn's theory, however, all scientific worldviews & paradigms, regardless of their merits vis-a-vis one another, are ultimately time-bound & relative. The current "health" of alternative healing strategies is placed in that context, viewing them as signs of the limitations & inadequacies of biomedicine & its paradigm.

Smuth, Kathleen A. (Alzheimer Center University Hospitals of Cleveland, 2074 Abington Rd OH 44106), The Effects of Socially Desirable Response Tendency on Reports of Caregiver Burden.

Measurement of the nature & effects of the impact of caring for the frail & impaired elderly has focused on distinguishing objective demands from caregiving from subjective effects (burden), & emotional burden from social & behavioral impacts. Here, a possible source of invalidity in burden measurement is addressed: its confounding with the tendency of respondents to give socially desirable responses. The literatures on the assessment of the socially desirable response tendency & caregiver burden are reviewed, & the conceptual basis for the confounding effects of the former in the latter are discussed. Data from face-to-face interviews with 100 caregivers of veterans aged 65+ being discharged after an acute care hospital stay are presented. Socially desirable response tendency as measured by items selected from the Marlowe-Crowne Social Desirability Scale was found to be inversely correlated with caregiver burden as measured by the Robinson Caregiver Strain Index, & directly correlated with age. Multiple regression analysis reveals that when socially desirable response tendency is controlled, a previously statistically significant inverse relationship between age & burden is rendered nonsignificant.

Snyder, Pamela R. & Schlarb, Janet E. (U Pittsburgh, PA 15260), A Case Study of a Voluntary Preventive Evacuation.

¶ An examination of a voluntary preventive evacuation conducted in the small Ru community of Confluence, Pa. The evacuation order was issued on 6 May 1987 at 4 AM in response to a potential chemical emergency caused by a train derailment. Shortly after the incident, research was undertaken to gain insight into how the general public & emergency responders reacted during the potential emergency: a telephone survey consisting primarily of closed-ended questions was administered (N = 106 Rs), & local public officials & emergency responders were interviewed face-to-face. Descriptive statistics are used in the analysis of the data, & the findings are examined in conjunction with the findings of other incidents documented in the disaster literature. Differences in the responses to the various incidents discussed are explained by their differing contexts. Demographic, geographic, & social factors that affect emergency response are identified.

Spreitzer, Elmer A. & Snyder, Eldon E. (Sociology Dept Bowling Green State U, OH 43403), Sports Involvement and Quality of Life.

¶ An analysis of participation in sports as a form of leisure, based on telephone interview data from a random-digit sample of adults (N not given) in a midwestern state. Focus is on perceived deficits in the quality of one's life as factors that might predispose one toward sports (both active participation & watching sports on TV); ie, sports involvement is investigated as a possible form of escapism. The findings offer no clear support for the compensatory theory. The data were displayed in several formats in an attempt to isolate compensatory patterns, but there was no consistent pattern of persons involved in sports scoring lower than nonparticipants on a series of quality-of-life indicators.

Stallard, Stephen W. & Kart, Cary S. (Ball State U, Muncie IN 47306), Organizational Homogeneity among Nursing Homes (1).

¶ Dimaggio & Powell (1983) propose that organizations in a field no longer become increasingly efficient due to competition but, on the contrary, become more alike without regard to efficiency. Three possible causal agents are described: coercive, mimetic, & normative isomorphism. A 2-part factor analysis strategy is applied to data from the National Nursing Home Survey of 1977 (NNHS77) to identify whether processes of institutional isomorphism are detectable in the organizational field of nursing homes. An R-analysis identifies 4 important factors or organizational dimensions; a Q-analysis carried out on a sample of 100 nursing homes in the NNHS77 yielded 2 important groupings of facilities. The analysis is limited by the NNHS77 data set, which contains only measures of the structural & physical characteristics of US nursing homes, no measures of processual or decision-making characteristics are available. An absence of longitudinal data makes it difficult to assess the extent of isomorphic processes.

Stull, Donald E. & Heizer, Kathie (Dept Sociology U Akron, OH 44325), The Extent of Family Caregiving for Community Elderly.

¶ Policymakers & planners are aware that the level of public resources needed for long-term care of the elderly is related to the amount of family resources devoted to their care. Data from several national data sets & small area surveys are presented indicating what is known, & what in-

United States.

Data from the 1982 General Social Survey are used to examine the interrelationships between racial prejudice & a number of authoritarianism-related attitudes. The prejudice items generally did correlate with the other attitudes, & the correlations with intolerance of deviance, as well as with support of the traditional F role, were substantial. The correlations with political conservatism items were, however, sometimes lower than in earlier research. The prejudice items also had high loadings on a general factor that emerged in a principal components analysis. The results suggest that it is still useful to regard prejudice as part of a broader attitudinal syndrome, but that the content of the syndrome may have changed somewhat in recent years

Reeves, Edward B. (Dept Sociology Morehead State U, KY 40351), Legitimate Domination in a Muslim Society (Egypt).

¶ The connection between religious ideology & legitimate domination is a pillar of Weberian conflict theory, yet, progress exploring the theory's abundant ramifications is hampered because most sociologists confine their research to contemporary Euro-American societies. Seeking to broaden & deepen theoretical developments in this regard, a case study is presented of the "hidden government" of Muslim saints in Mamluk & Ottoman Egypt. The analysis calls forth two lessons. The methodological lesson is that Robert Wuthnow is correct in stating that studies of ideology need to focus less on belief & more on cultural institutions such as ritual performances in order to provide more concrete evidence. The theoretical lesson concerns two possible ways of conceiving how legitimate domination works: the "dominant ideology thesis" of Karl Marx & Friedrich Engels, & Gaetano Mosca's "political formula" paradigm. It is suggested that Mosca's perspective requires fewer social psychological assumptions, & thus may be the preferred approach for dealing with historical data

Ritter, Christian, Benson, Denzel E. & Snyder, Clint (Dept Sociology Kent State U, OH 44242), Belief in a Just World and the Stress Process.

¶ In an exploration of the relationship between "belief in a just world" (BJW) & depression, the basic models examined follow the work of Leonard I. Pearlin, Morton A. Lieberman, Elizabeth G. Menaghan, & Joseph T. Mullans on the stress process (see SA 30.4/82M4090), but are expanded to include BJW in the relationship between economic hardship & symptoms of depression. While there is theoretical justification for the role that BJW might play in these relationships, there is no empirical evidence to substantiate its role in clarifying the mechanisms by which stressors affect psychological state. Three empirical questions that follow from the above conceptualization are posed. (1) Can BJW & "mastery" be independently measured? (2) Does BJW affect the relationship between economic hardship & depression over & above the effect of "mastery"? (3) What subgroup differences (specifically SC & gender), if any, exist in the above relationships? The data used to address these questions came from a 1987 mailed questionnaire survey of a random sample of 283 noninstitutionalized adult residents of Northern Ireland, where the unemployment rate is about 20%. A number of important findings are discussed, & questions that require further exploration are noted

Rudy, David R., Reeves, Edward B. & Ashworth, Scott (Sociology/Social Work/Corrections Morehead State U, KY 40351), Symbol Work: Hero and Villain as Negotiated Constructs.

¶ Deviance theory has highlighted the significance of moral or normative boundaries & the process of status degradation. It is argued here that boundary work has a parallel dimension, core work—a process of status elevation for the purpose of celebrating core values of the collectivity. These parallel ideas are developed under the rubric of "symbol work." While some symbol work is clear-cut as to type—the exclusion of sinners & villains, for example, or the veneration of heroes & saints—other symbol work is problematic. In the problematic case, boundary work & core work are locked together in a dialectic. This appears to be particularly true where jurisdiction of authority & legitimacy is in dispute, as often occurs in political arenas. A contemporary example of problematic symbol work is described, the saga of Ollie North in the Iran-contra affair. Using news reports & editorials as evidence, discussed are the dynamics of symbol work, the settings in which it may occur, & some underlying structural constraints. In conclusion, it is suggested that the analysis of symbol work necessitates the synthesis of a number of theoretical perspectives in sociology, including deviance, culture, & conflict theory

Sabo, D. F. (D'Youville Coll, Buffalo NY 14201), Creating a Feminist Analysis of Men and Masculinity: The Case of Sport.

¶ An analysis of certain dimensions of sport, seeking to demonstrate utility of feminist theoretical perspectives for understanding men's behavior & psychology. A feminist analysis of sport recognizes that elements of patriarchal social organization, values, & ideologies exist in sport, & it assumes that a main function of traditional sport is to conform to patriarchal values & to empower M elites. Several gender issues are discussed in light of the emerging feminist critique of sport including competition among Ms, socialization for war, & M violence against women. The concept of the "inter-M dominance hierarchy" is defined, & its relevance for understanding gender relations is discussed. It is argued that essential forms of athletic socialization are geared to induce boys to the wide M status hierarchy & to acclimate them to M authority & F inferiority. Finally, current trends that link feminist theory & critical theory in sport sociology are identified

Scarlsbrick-Hauser, AnneMarie & Lewis, Jerry M. (Dept Sociology U Akron, OH 44325), An Analysis of the Brixton Riots Using Smelser's Model of Collective Behavior.

¶ During the weekend of 10-12 Apr 1981, a series of public disorders took place in the Brixton area of London, England. Events leading up to this hostile outburst are examined using Neil Smelser's (1962 [reference not provided]) theoretical model of collective behavior. Data are gathered using a "between method" approach of interviews, photograph analysis, site visitation, & analysis of newspapers & police documents (Lewis, 1986 [no reference provided]). It was vital to the authorities that the Brixton incident be immediately brought under control because of the small size of the area. In a test of the application of the Smelser model combined with the Lewis protocol as a means of analyzing the Brixton disorders, it appears that the five components of the Smelser theoretical model are applicable. (1) Structural conduciveness is identified as the catalyzed response to the continual police harassment & institutional racism. (2) Structural strain is observed in the different cultural/value system of the Brixton ethnic community, & the police are representatives of the English system. (3) A generalized hostile belief developed among the residents & spread rapidly due to the geographical smallness of the area & the ease of movement among the youth. (4) Mobilization occurred due to the outward manifestation of strain & frustration coupled with the geographical structure of the area. (5) Social control of a hostile outburst is evident in the Brixton episode, in fact, it appears to be a limiting factor contributing to it. The Lewis protocol appears to be a viable methodological strategy in studying collective episodes such as the Brixton riots

¶ Outpatient commitment allows for compulsory outpatient treatment of the mentally ill. Outpatient commitment is examined in terms of wider institutional purposes: greater social control of the mentally ill in the community & a less restrictive environment than inpatient commitment. Six-month follow-up data from 161 patients ordered to outpatient commitment in NC are examined to determine the extent to which inpatient-level outcomes are consistent with institutional purposes. Outpatient commitment provides for both a least restrictive alternative & social control over the mentally ill in the community. More research into outpatient commitment is necessary before its effectiveness in providing for needs of the mentally ill can be fully evaluated.

Sengstock, Mary C. (Dept Sociology Wayne State U, Detroit MI 48202), Retirement Planning for Women: Is It More of the Same?

¶ The special needs of aging women are considered & recommendations made for the development of retirement planning programs especially designed for women. Among the issues that should be included are the following: (1) It is particularly important for women to begin their retirement planning early, especially in financial matters, since women are less likely to have adequate income in retirement than men. (2) Women more so than men, should plan for a longer life span, including a possible long illness, & a long period alone. These factors have implications hypothesized that women would perceive more events as occurring at a higher degree of stress than men. Analysis is based on scale questionnaire data from 1,600+ husband-wife pairs in 8 states. For 17 of the events, significantly more wives than husbands reported that event had occurred, & for 33+% of the events, wives reported a higher degree of stress; these events primarily involved interpersonal relationships & household activities. Husbands & wives were less likely to report events related to work & financial matters. No events were reported more often by husbands, nor were any reported as more stressful by men. More stressful events were reported by Urban than by Rural Rs, but men tended to report more economic stressors. Degree of stress for events did not differ significantly by area of residence. It is concluded that women tend to be more involved than men with interpersonal relationships & thus experience more stress related to family life. The internal contexts of the family are associated with the perception of events & degree of stress experienced.

Wallerstein, Morton G. (Dept Sociology U Louisville, KY 40292), The Ideological Preconditions for Praxigenic Theory, or Some Axiological Assumptions in Search of an Agent.

One of the debates about the directionality of human historical development is that is embedded in the conflict over postmodernist social theory. At the level of abstractions about abstractions, even to the point where the text of theoretical utterances is treated as meaningful independent of its content. At its root, however, the postmodernist critique of theory is a logical negation of a form of theorization that treats history in a distinctively premodern fashion, i.e., as an imperative existing independent of the material lives of the humans who constitute it. In this postmodernism is the deformity that grows from the barren soil of Cartesian structuralism. The deficiencies of both postmodernism & structuralism reveal that what is needed to comprehend the current moment & its place in the succession of moments, is an understanding of the conditions that shape the real historical actors of whom Karl Marx & Friedrich Engels spoke in The German Ideology (1939), i.e., the origins of the doldrums of the present moment are not to be sought in abstract theories about history, but rather, in the social specifics of the existing world, e.g., fundamental changes in the nature of the human subject effected by long-lived capitalist societies. The unquestioned assumption about the unchanging nature of the human subject are the origins of the intellectual bafflement within Marxist theory, & the source of intellectual stenciling for antiprogessive thought.

Complete paper available from SA Reproduction Service prepaid at $0.25 per page plus $1.50 search & postage. Length of paper: 18pp. Recent legislation, coupled with changing attitudes of men & women, has caused many to question whether husbands may freely force sex on their wives. Here, attitudes toward what should happen to a husband who forces his wife to have sex are examined based on data from a telephone survey of a random sample of 300 adults in Columbus, Ohio. Some 50% of Rs felt mandatory counseling should be the form of action for husbands who force their wives to have sex, the remainder suggested incarceration & grounds for divorce. The only R sociodemographic characteristics found to be statistically significant with regard to differential sanctions for marital rape were gender & age. Ms tended to choose incarceration & grounds for divorce, while the majority of Fs favored mandatory counseling. Younger Rs favored incarceration, while older Rs favored grounds for divorce. The data clearly demonstrate that the overwhelming majority of Rs perceive marital rape as less serious than rape in general.

● Complete paper available from SA Reproduction Service prepaid at $0.25 per page plus $1.50 search & postage. Length of paper: 22 pp. ¶ Home & road won & loss records of major league baseball teams from 1969 through 1986 were examined to discern dome & artificial turf effects on the home field advantage. Analysis of 35,000+ major league baseball games indicates that teams playing under domes won 10.5% more games at home than on the road, while teams playing in open air stadiums won 7.2% more games at home than on the road. Such an effect translates to an additional 3 games per season won for teams playing home contests under domes. Such an effect on division races reveals that 25% of the division championships would have been altered by the strategic use of domed stadiums over the past 2 decades. Results are interpreted in terms of Emile Durkheim's common bond of solidarity enhancing the performance of the home team's athletes.

The role of modern medicine in Nepal is examined, & it is argued that modern medicine has contributed to the quality of health care in Nepal by (1) creating an awareness of health & illness among the people, (2) leading to the modernization & institutionalization of traditional medicine, (3) helping to identify the relative advantages of the different types of health care systems, & (4) expanding the ability of persons to select the type of treatment best suited for their illness.

Taplin, Ian (Dept Sociology Wake Forest U, Winston-Salem NC 27109), Using the State to Control Labor.

¶ By the late 1960s it was evident, following the growing number of wildcat strikes, that union management arrangements for regulating work relations in the US coal industry were deficient. Wage & benefit bargaining of the type developed by John L. Lewis & sustained by the Coal Operators Assoc no longer appealed a younger & better educated generation of miners, who had recently entered the pits. Institutional arrangements for the resolution of specific workplace grievances were culpably inadequate, & new professionalized management strategies toward labor merely exacerbated existing latent tensions. Rank-&-file unrest, independent of union orchestration during the early 1970s, & the politicization of much strike activity (eg, the Black Lung movement) forced operators to rely on the state to discipline the LF. Injunctions against striking miners & court endorsed dismissals became central features of management's labor relations strategy. The return of "order" to collective bargaining in the coal industry following the disciplinary involvement of the state is described. It is argued that this new order threatens the legitimacy of the United Mine Workers of America to represent US coal miners.

Taylor, Verta & Spears, Stephanie (Sociology Dept Ohio State U, Columbus 43210), Breaking the Emotional Rules of Motherhood: The Experience of Postpartum Depression.

¶ Postpartum depression (PPD) has long been part of both the common-sense & the scientific views of the psychology of women's transition to motherhood. Yet to date there has been no research on the sociological aspects of PPD. Here, women's conceptions of PPD are examined to analyze how different patterns of role strain experienced by new mothers & normative prescriptions governing the expected emotional states of the new mother contribute to PPD, based on data from: (1) in-depth interviews with 100 women, (2) interviews with 50 medical & mental health providers; (3) content analysis of the professional literature used in medical & psychiatric education; & (4) content analysis of the popular literature on pregnancy & motherhood. Using a "sociology of emotions" perspective, it is demonstrated that the feelings women associate with PPD are, in essence, the antithesis of the emotions expected of the new mother. It is this norm-state discrepancy that leads women to experience their feelings as distressful. Analyzing PPD as a distressful emotion associated with impaired power & status relations, it can then be understood as response to a deprivation of status experienced by new mothers, either the loss of previous status or the failure to attain the anticipated status. To the extent that motherhood is not the esteemed role that women expect it to be, those who give up other roles & statuses to become mothers are more likely to experience emotional distress than new mothers who function under the strain of multiple roles.

¶ Three questions are addressed: (1) What was the nature of class struggle during the environmental decade? (2) What forms did it take? (3) What forces shaped & limited the forms & outcomes of this struggle? The theoretical component of the analysis is based on Eric Olin Wright's formulations on class boundaries & contradictory class locations, also considered are Nicos Poulantzas's formulations on class boundaries & the mental vs manual labor distinction. Wright's & Poulantzas's formulations are compared & contrasted against key developments in the federal environmental legislation during the 1970s. Empirical data are drawn from the testimony of key witnesses in the 1971 & 1977 US Senate Federal Water Pollution Control Legislation hearings, focusing on the structure of interests & concerns regarding this legislation. The political-economic context of water pollution control legislation is also considered. It is argued that because of the noneconomic emphasis of this legislation, Poulantzas's class analysis is especially valuable because it enables the identification of specific forms of class struggle. In addition, Poulantzas's theory is useful in closely examining the role of the state & the role of the market in shaping & limiting the outcomes of class struggle during the environmental decade. Wright's class analysis is less useful in explaining the formation of water pollution control legislation because of its overemphasis on class struggle at the production level.

¶ An examination of white long-term residents in the US in 1977, 1978 & 1980, based on aggregate data from the NORC General Survey (N = 4,015 Rs). Long-term residents were defined as those who were living at present in the same place they lived in at age 16. Cross-tabulations using migratory status were run with selected variables & chi-square computed. Results show that long-term residents, as compared to migrants, more often come from families where the father had a lower status occupation, have achieved less education & are in a lower status occupation themselves, are more often third or greater generation in place & are often never married. Long-term residents are more apt to be living in neighborhoods where there are no blacks, but contrary to expectations are more liberal than migrants. They tend more often to live in the largest central cities or in the more RU areas. There are no differences between long-term residents & migrants with respect to satisfaction with place, job, or health, or in church attendance.

RE: New Ancillary Services

In addition to publishing Supplements of abstracts of papers presented at meetings — as well as our regular yearly search of over 1500 serials for articles on sociology and other sociologically relevant articles which are published in sociological abstracts — we wish you to know about our expanded services to the social science community.

Abstracts of individual papers presented at this meeting and processed by sociological abstracts become available online with the following labels/vendors: File 37/Dialog Information Services; SOCA/BRS, BRKTHRU, After Dark; SOCS1/Knowledge Index; and SOCA/Data-Star.

Many requests will reach us for a copy of your paper from government agencies, private researchers and business R&D offices. Such requests will be passed along, whenever possible and if we have the author's correct address, to the author. Considerable time can be saved if authors who desire to make their papers available to all comers, send us a copy of the paper with a signed statement granting our permission to reproduce the paper.

I enclose a copy of my paper for reproduction and sale.

- (3) Subject Index covers all Main Section and Supplement abstracts.
- (4) Accession numbers beginning with the letter S refer to abstracts of papers presented at association conferences; they are bound together as supplements following the issue's main section. Accession numbers beginning with uppercase letters other than S refer to abstracts of journal articles included in the issue.

Your editors will no longer accept excuses!

Now you can check the accuracy of your my references in a matter of seconds.

If you need to verify an author's name and/or the complete bibliographic citation of his/her article ... sa has 180,000 citations waiting online for your query (time span 1968 onward) ...

If you need to proof the title and subtitle, or year of publication, or name of a book's translator, or the original language, ... IRPS awaits you with over 53,000 book reviews culled from over 240 core sociology journals, continuously screened, abstracted, and indexed from a dozen+ languages (time span 1980 onward) ...

If you need the reprint of an article quickly, each online record tells you how and from whom it can be ordered. sa's document delivery service is fast and inexpensive.

Here's how you can tap into our tapes

Information professionals can use BRS (file label SOCA), Data-Star (file label SOCA); and Dialog (file 37) for searches.

Subject specialists can access sa on three user-friendly services: BRS's After Dark and Colleague (file labels SOCA) and Dialog's Knowledge index (file SOCS1).

Of course, all our information products are available in traditional hard copy. Does your library have a complete set?

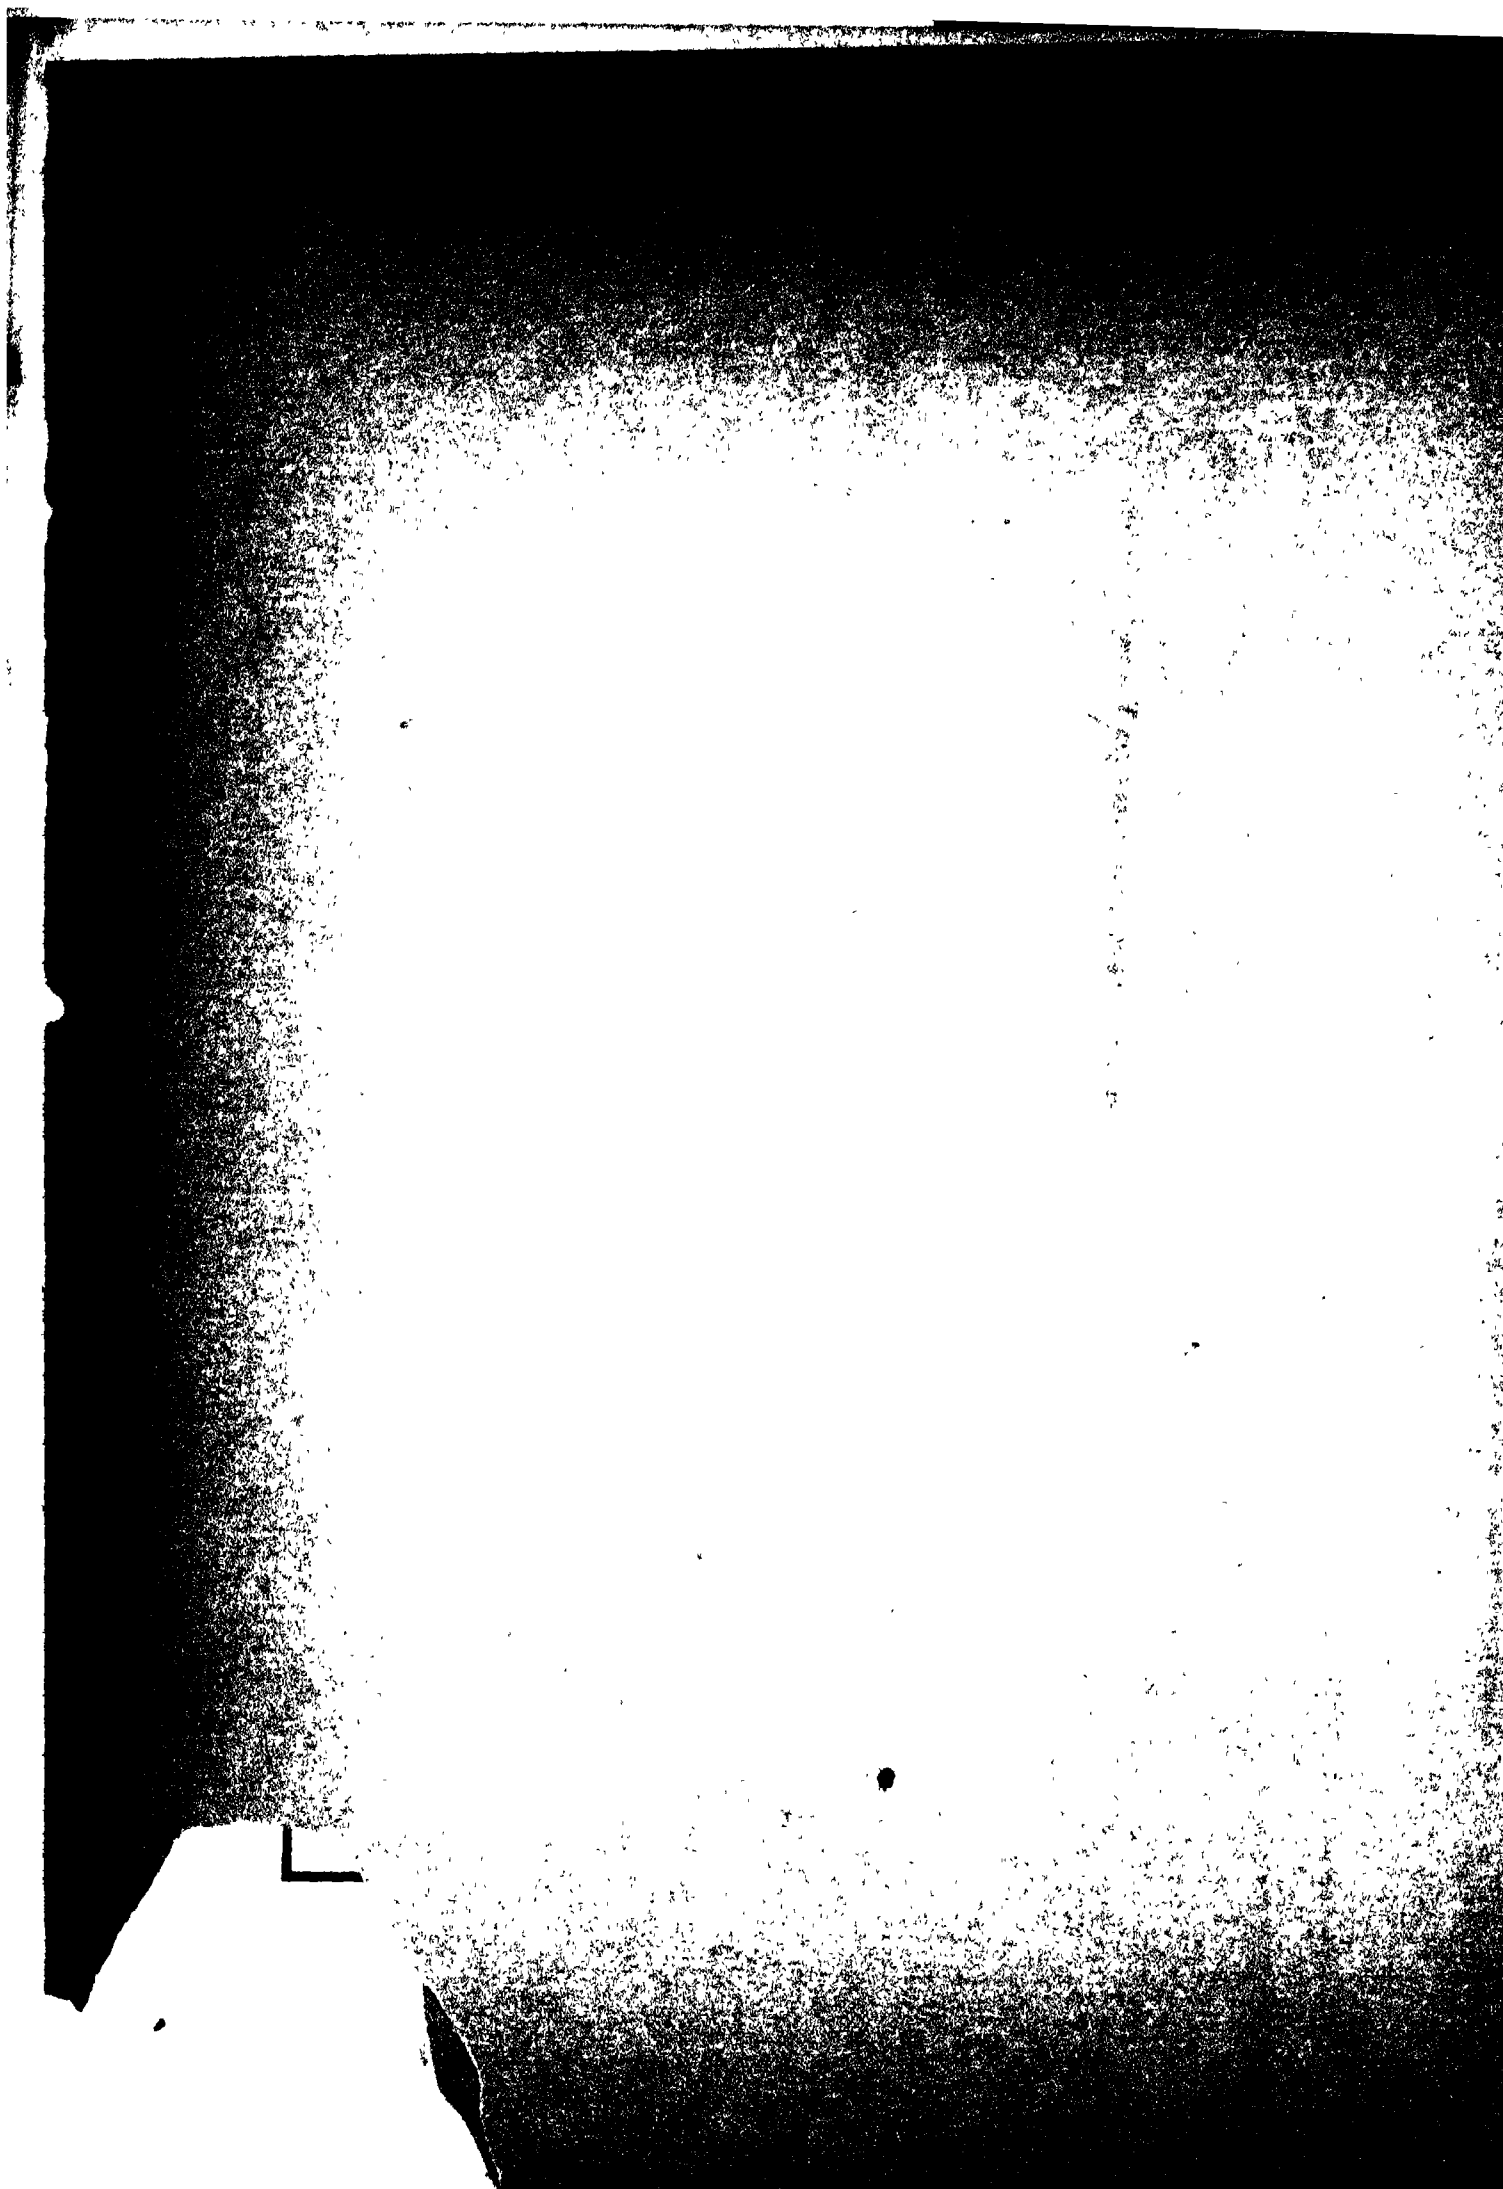

sa's print and online services are updated in April, June, August, October and December.

JOURNAL OF CROSS CULTURAL AND INTERLANGUAGE COMMUNICATION

General Editor

RICHARD J. WATTS

University of Berne

MULTILINGUA investigates causes and possible solutions to communication problems in cross cultural verbal interaction. In its consideration of different linguistic systems MULTILINGUA will not restrict itself to national languages, but will also focus on language varieties, the interplay between oral languages and written standards, linguistic politeness forms, socio-cultural values, conversational style and strategies for the organization of verbal interaction.

MULTILINGUA is committed to supporting interlingual communication and to affirming the benefits of multilingual societies. By offering both theoretical and practical approaches, MULTILINGUA is of interest to

- General linguists
- Translators and Interpreters
- Language teachers
- Administrators
- Socio- and Psycholinguists
- Anthropologists
